The visitor, stimulated to heroic enterprise, descends warily, with palpitating pulse, into the forgotten regions of the poor. The result is cruel disillusionment. He had expected a chaotic and sodden wilderness; he finds an immensity of clean streets, trim houses, curtained windows. He was prepared for a ferocious and brutalised multitude, each eagerly seeking to do him to death. He finds a good-humoured, tired, contented populace. No thugs spring up suddenly to choke him. His tall hat but provokes an occasional allusion to Kruger. He returns a disappointed man to proclaim the whole thing another fraud of the charitable.

Evidently "the Abyss" requires interpretation, and this the author, excellently equipped every way for the rôle of interpreter, essays. He reveals the 400,000 living, amid these mean streets and block dwellings, the one-roomed tenement life, and as we proceed through the two-roomed and three-roomed tenements (the latter the typical "home") the misery grows rather than diminishes. It seems to culminate in the chapter "Of John Smith," the typical bricklayer. There is nothing vicious, nothing repulsive about "John Smith," any more than there is about Mrs. John Smith, "a harassed, tired-looking woman, who appears to live in a perpetual atmosphere of damp steamy washing." There is nothing vicious or repulsive about the street in which the couple live. The misery of the Abyss consists in its dulness, its hopelessness, its unchanging monotony and impenetrable apathy. Everything that has been tried to arouse John Smith has proved vain. Art and poetry and social economics; lantern lectures and pleasant Sunday afternoons, blatant free-thinking and rights-of-labour—all alike fail to arouse the romance latent in John Smith. Just below his level lies a far drearier class—the shiftless, the homeless, the vagabond, the hooligan; and the work of all social reformers seems—according to our author—to culminate in the conversion of this wastrel class to the soulless level of John Smith. That there is another outcome of social endeavour we cannot but believe; the man or woman quickened into responsibility and pity by Evangelical agencies is a more human product than John Smith, and such there certainly are who have been reclaimed from the nethermost. But our author evidently thinks these exceptions too trifling to mention beside the two vast classes on either side the "poverty-line"—the soulless respectable and the degraded. The misery of the one class is felt to be only a degree lighter than that of the other; and when social endeavour has done its utmost, and the wastrel is raised to the level of John Smith, all that has been done is to render soullessness self-supporting. Such seems to be the melancholy conclusion.

We should like to quote largely from this book, but did space permit, the task of selection would be rendered difficult by the uniform ability and convincingness of the descriptions. Among more that will linger in the reader's imagination will be the vision of the Abyss at nightfall, the Saturday night marketing, the overloaded tram that is always looming through the book discharging its burden, and attracting a like swarm of human bees, and—welcome contrast!—the pictures of the children (some few of them) in their aimless holiday rambles through meadow and wood in "the Land Beyond." "You can see flowers all along the road." "We all went home from the gardens very happy." "Every day I go to get the eggs from the fowls, and I feed the pigs every day." "Sometimes we used to lie down covered all over with ferns, and then go to sleep." Such are extracts from the children's own descriptions of their holidays. Poor little mites! But what is not possible with children capable of such descriptions, and the simple artless love that prompts them, if only they could be rescued in time from the brutalising monotony of bricks and mortar and reared in the pure air and sweet lanes where nature intended they should grow?

JACOB DELAFIELD.*

The name at the head of this article is that of one of the chief characters in Mrs. Humphry Ward's last novel, "Lady Rose's Daughter," which is just completed in the April Harper, and was published last month in book form. In the illustrated magazine pictures were, of course, to be expected, but the book, we confess, would have seemed to us stronger without the six illustrations which have been included. The persons there depicted do not in the least help our conception of the interesting characters in the story, but rather the reverse.

We have put Jacob Delafield's name at the head of this article, because in his character and its influence upon the development of the story centres what we have found to be the most serious interest of the book. "Lady Rose's Daughter" is a story which moves exclusively in a very high aristocratic circle, a study of life "in what passes as the best of English society." The heroine, Julie Le Breton, is the daughter of Lady Rose Delaney, who many years before the beginning of the story had made a scandal by breaking away from an uncongenial and childless marriage for the sake of Marriott Dalrymple, with whom she lived in obscurity near Brussels, till his death. When she also died, some ten years later, she left her only daughter to grow up in very humble circumstances at Bruges, Lord Lackington, the girl's grandfather, furnishing an allowance of £100 on condition that the family should not be further molested, and no claim to the relationship should be made.

When the story opens, Julie Le Breton is companion to Lady Henry Delafield, who is the centre of a very brilliant social circle in London, but is growing old and infirm. Lady Henry's Wednesday evenings have long been famous, and the first scenes of this comedy of high life, with its tragic undercurrent, reveal her furious jealousy of the younger woman (whom she engaged, knowing of her parentage, but with a strict injunction to secrecy), who has developed the most astonishing social gifts, and appears to have become herself the chief glory of her employer's salon.

How Julie uses her powers of influence over Cabinet Ministers and generals, to forward the interests of her friends, and how the story proceeds, most dramatically in the breach with Lady Henry, and through other scenes of strong emotion, must be read in the book itself. We take the conversation and manners of these exalted people on trust; but would an elderly and distinguished diplomatist in, perhaps, the seventies of last century, speaking to Lady Henry, really have dropped into such a piece of schoolboy slang as "I seem, indeed, to have jolly well wasted my time"?

Jacob Delafield, a nephew of Lady Henry's, and possible heir to a great dukedom (which in the end he actually inherits), appears on the first page of the story, but we do not discover until nearly half way through the book that he is a really notable person. He and the Duchess of Crowborough, her cousin, have become Julie Le Breton's chief allies, to defend her from Lady Henry's asperities, and Delafield has twice offered marriage in vain.

He and Dr. Meredith are the only persons in the book in whom one sees any real nobleness of character. Julie is a pathetic figure, in spite of her brilliance, by reason of her origin and the circumstances of her bringing up; one pities her even more for the humiliation of her passion for Warkwarth, the ambitious and selfish young soldier whom she has helped by her intrigues to a coveted appointment; but it is only in the end, when he is dead, that the dawning of a nobler life comes for her.

Delafield saved her at the last critical moment from a lawless meeting with Warkwarth:—

"Miss Le Breton! You were going to Paris to meet Major Warkwarth?"

She drew back.

"And if I was!" she said, with a wild defiance.

"I had to prevent it—that was all."

His tone was calm and resolution itself.

"Who—who gave you authority over me?"

"One may save, even by violence. You were too precious—to be allowed to destroy yourself."

His look, so sad and strong—the look of a deep compassion—fastened itself upon her. He felt himself indeed possessed by a force not his own, that same force which in its supreme degree made St. Francis "the great tamer of souls."

And later in the same scene he says:—"I have given you pain. I ask your pardon from the bottom of my heart—and at the same time"—his voice trembled—"I thank God that I had the courage to do it!"

This is the man who is described as on the one side "a robust, healthy Etonian," but on another:—

A man haunted by dreams and spiritual voices, a man for whom as he paced his tired horse homeward after a day's run there would rise on the greys and purples of the winter dusk far-shining "cities of God," and visions of a better life for man. He read much poetry, and the New Testament spoke to him imperatively, though in no orthodox or accustomed way. Ruskin and the earlier works of Tolstoy, then just beginning to take hold of the English mind, had affected his thought and imagination, as the generation before him had been affected by Carlyle, Emerson, and George Sand.

He is a good man of business, and in revolt against his aristocratic surroundings, a lover of simplicity of life. We get just a glimpse of his life in the country, where he has bachelor quarters in an Essex village, as agent of the Duke of Cudleigh's property. The Duke, with one invalid son, is his cousin, and it is the great dread of Delafield's life that the inheritance may be forced upon him. In the end he marries Julie Le Breton, and the story of his growing ascendancy over her is of profound interest. She consented at first in hopelessness, and because she had promised her grandfather on his deathbed, but through experiences which must be read of in the book she is more and more impressed by the nobleness of her husband's character, and at last the true love dawns in her heart.

It was one of those hours which determine the history of a man or woman. And the august Alpine beauty entered in; so that Julie, in this sad and thrilling act of self-probing, felt herself in the presence of powers and dominations divine.

Her face, stained with tears, took gradually some of the calm, the loftiness of the night; yet the close-shut brooding mouth would slip sometimes into a smile—exquisitely soft and gentle; as though the heart remembered something which seemed to the intelligence at once folly—and sweetness!

What was going on within her was, to her own consciousness, a strange thing. It appeared to her as a kind of simplification, a return to childhood; or rather, was it the emergence in the grown mind, tired with the clamour of its own egotistical or passionate life, of some instincts, natural to the child, which she, nevertheless, as a child, had never known; instincts of trust, of self-abandonment, steeped, perhaps, in those tears which are themselves only another happiness? . . .

We should have been glad if the study of Delafield's religion had been more complete. "A man of 'recollection,' living in the eye of the Eternal," Julie felt him to be; "mystically possessed by the passion of a spiritual ideal; in love with charity, purity, simplicity of life." And at the crisis of his life and his love for Julie, Mrs. Ward says of him:

That mysterious It, that other divine self of the mystic — God — the enwrapping, sheltering force, had been with him always. It was with him now—it spoke from the mysterious colour and light of the dawn.

It, we confess, does not satisfy our feeling for that Divine Presence in a noble life. But there would seem to have been more in Delafield's religion, for immediately this prayer is added, which comes closer to the reality of a reverent and trustful heart:—

"Friend of my soul—and of the world—make me Thy tool—Thy instrument! Thou art Love!—speak through me!—draw her heart to mine."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

The Contemporary for this month has secured a welcome translation of Harnack's article in the Preussische Jahrbücher, commenting on the German Emperor's confession of faith and his criticism of Professor Delitzsch in connection with the Babel u. Bibel controversy. We have already quoted Harnack's declaration regarding the current doctrine of the Deity of Christ that the Pauline saying "God was in Christ" marks the furthest point to which definition ought to go, and that the true ideal for the Christian is to be found in the exhortation, "If ye love Me, keep My commandments." Another article of ecclesiastical, if not religious interest is that by Archdeacon Watkins (of Lucknow, not Durham), on "Should Churchmen make for Disestablishment?" answering the question from the High Churchman's point of view in the affirmative. The real question, it is pointed out, is of disendowment, not of disestablishment. Scholars will also note the reply of Professor Jannaris to Dr. Abbott on the subject of "The Encyclopædia Biblica and the Gospels." Mr. Lloyd George contributes a valuable article on "The New Education Schemes," showing how many County schemes, following the enlightened lead of Surrey rather than the Hertford (or Hatfield) scheme, promise well for future efficiency as against sectarian domination. The joint-article on "The Native Labour Question in South Africa" is also of the first importance, with its strong plea for consideration for the native.

The Nineteenth Century and After opens with four "Church" articles, dealing with the "Crisis" from various points of view—that of Lord Halifax, whose ideal Churchman is Archbishop Laud, and who insists that the Church must have autonomy, and does not shrink from contemplating disestablishment as the only way of deliverance for the extreme High Churchman from an intolerable position; that of Lady Wimborne, who laments on behalf of the people, that they are driven from their churches by the Romanising clergy, and sets her hope on the new Archbishop; that of Sir George Arthur, who pleads for "Loyalty to the Prayer-book"; and that of a Broad Church vicar, who appeals to the Dean and Canons of Westminster to go further in the path they have entered in their dealing with the Athanasian Creed, and make the Abbey a rallying-place for an earnest and devout liberal movement in the Church. The Countess of Warwick tells of how well a detachment from the Salvation Army Colony at Hadleigh worked for her, and pleads for more practical support, through using the labour they can supply. The Army, she says, obtains better results than others, in permanently lifting up the wastrel into a useful labourer.

In the Fortnightly the Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford, replies to Dr. A. W. Wallace on the subject of "Man's Place in the Universe," arguing that his plea for a bounded universe of stars is untenable. In the Westminster Mr. Franklin Thomasson writes on "The Housing Question in 1903." The National has an article on the notorious case of the "Good Shepherd" at Nancy.

The Monthly Review opens with an appreciation of "John Inglesant," and after this should be read the article by Edith Sichel on "Henry Vaughan: Silurist." The illustrated article is on "The Lace Industry," by Clementina Black.

The World's Work is as varied in its interests as ever. There are some capital stories of the King of Italy, "A King who has won success by his work." Among the striking full-page portraits is one of Mr. W. E. Henley, "the first great poet to write in verse on Motoring." That he is a great poet, Mr William Archer affirms, and the poem in question, "A Song of Speed," fills eight pages of this number. Among the many practical matters touched upon, one may read of "Diamond-cutting in Amsterdam," and of "Bookbinding as a Trade for Women."

OBITUARY.

MR. C. W. WILLMER.

Our report last week of the opening of the new church at Birkenhead made reference to the shadow cast over the proceedings by the death on that day of Mr. Charles Watkin Willmer, who, with other members of his family, had long been closely associated with the life of the congregation. The second son of the late Alderman Charles Willmer, he was born in Liverpool, November 1848, and in Liverpool and Birkenhead his life was spent. His father established a printing business in Birkenhead, into which on leaving school he entered, and later was sent over to Liverpool to establish a branch there. For some years he was editor of the Liverpool Review, and became well known as an earnest Liberal and a dogged political worker. He was especially identified with the founding of the Junior Reform Club, and served for three successive years as president.

In 1890 he succeeded his brother, the late Frederick Willmer, as editor of the Birkenhead News, and from that time threw himself completely into the political and social life of the town. He was a strong organiser and a wise counsellor on the Liberal side, and was prominently identified with the candidatures of Mr. W. H. Lever. Mr. Willmer had suffered for some time from a painful illness, borne with great fortitude, and death came to him as a welcome release.

What he was to his friends may be seen from the striking tributes published in the Birkenhead News of March 21, which contains also a full record of his public work. This brief notice we cannot close better than by quoting from one of those tributes. Thus a friend of many years' standing writes of Mr. Willmer :—

His external bearing, perhaps a trifle cold and distant in seeming, was in reality the thinnest of veils that ever covered a warm and generous nature. With an incisive intellect, and an outward semblance of reserve, he suffered, as such men do suffer, from occasional misunderstanding. A stranger's first impressions of him were as likely to be wrong as right. He had a certain doggedness of nature, united to an alert critical temperament, by which the weak spots in others were apt to be quickly detected; and this was not always pleasant for the others. But he had also a wealth of humanity and an overflowing good-will which, I fear, too often went unsuspected by those who knew him only on the surface. Those whose knowledge went deeper paid him greater tribute; while as for those who got close to the real man, and were admitted to his intimacy, I believe I state the simple truth when I say there was not one such who did not prove that so to know him was to love him.

Speaking further of his friend as a delightful holiday companion, and of their long talks about books and men, the same writer adds :—

His judgments were free and spontaneous, strongly coloured by his temperament, and with little regard to orthodox traditions, but always marked by insight, force and point. In literature, as in life, he took a man not for what was said about him by others, but for what seemed to him to be his genuine, intrinsic worth. His outlook on life was optimistic, and his chief quarrel with its representation in books was against those later writers, especially in fiction, whose self-elected mission is to preach a dreary gospel of pessimism. At such times, too, unsuspected depths of his nature would be revealed in the discussion of those mysteries of thought and belief which have formed the "obstinate questionings" of so many ages. The reverence and humility of his mind in these matters was a lesson and an inspiration.

MR. EDWARD GOLDSCHMIDT, J.P.

By the death of Mr. Edward Goldschmidt, which occurred very suddenly at Wiesbaden on March 23, Nottingham loses one of her most prominent citizens and the High Pavement Chapel an old and attached member. The late Mr. Goldschmidt, who was seventy-six years of age, was a native of Cassel, in Hesse, and coming to Nottingham in 1851 entered with characteristic energy on commercial pursuits, and built up an important business in connection with the silk trade. He early devoted his attention to the public work of the city of his adoption and became a member of the Town Council in 1871. In 1877 he was chosen alderman, and in 1881 and 1889 served the office of mayor, in the former of which years he was appointed magistrate. His services to the town in all these capacities were many and important, and his wise counsel was at all times eagerly sought and greatly valued. As chairman of the Free Libraries and Museum Committee he took an active interest in the foundation of Nottingham University College and turned the first sod on the site of the college buildings. When, owing to increasing deafness, he resigned his position on the Council in 1895, that body passed a resolution placing on record their sincere sense of the valuable services he had rendered to the Corporation and inhabitants of the town.

He also took great interest in educational work, and sat on the Nottingham School Board from 1873 to 1878.

As a member of the High Pavement congregation Mr. Goldschmidt brought to its service the same energy that he had shown in business and public life. He was a staunch Unitarian and took a warm interest in the chapel and its affairs, and acted as one of the chapel wardens from 1884 to 1887.

His educational zeal was also manifested by his work in connection with the High Pavement Day-schools, of which he was for many years a manager, and of whose Science-school he was chairman of committee from its establishment until it was taken over by the Nottingham School Board.

Of singularly bright and cheerful temperament and warm-hearted and kindly disposition, Mr. Goldschmidt was greatly beloved, and few will mourn him more sincerely than his fellow-worshippers at the High Pavement.

Mr. Goldschmidt's remains were cremated, and his ashes, in accordance with his desire, were buried in the general cemetery at Nottingham on March 30. Prior to the interment a funeral service was held in the High Pavement Chapel which was attended by the Mayor, the Town Clerk and many members of the Corporation and the magisterial Bench, besides a large number of his personal friends and fellow-worshippers. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas.

MRS. PERCY J. WINSER.

The news of Mrs. Winser's death was a great shock to hundreds of people in the neighbourhood of Birkenhead. Until quite recently, when the family removed to Biddulph Moor, Mrs. Winser was a highly valued member of our church. She won all hearts, not only by personal charm of manner, but also by the earnestness and thoroughness with which she threw herself into every kind of good work. At Port Sunlight she laboured unceasingly for the hundreds of girls and young women; she started a coffee tavern in Rock Ferry and helped in the management; she went to the Workhouse and brightened the lives of the most unfortunate inmates. These are but larger examples of the work prompted by a deep enthusiasm of humanity. And it is to be feared that Mrs. Winser overtaxed her strength in her desire to help others, and shortened her life by her labours for her kind. She never sat down calmly and coldly to calculate how much service she could render. She gave with both hands, good measure pressed down, running over. And to the grief of her family and a large circle of friends, she has paid the penalty of over-exertion with her life. It is very sad, and the only compensation for the loss is the warm admiration and affection of those who knew her and the deepest sympathy with those whose grief is keenest. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Child's Spring-Song.

If I were a blackbird and lived in a wood,
I'd make it the happiest place that I could;
I'd whistle, and carol, and warble all day,
Till all the world's trouble I warbled away.

If I were a swallow far over the sea,
I'd haste to the land that was waiting for me;
And there I would build me the cosiest nest,
And gather my little ones warm to my breast.

If I were an angel and sang up on high,
I'd shine, if I might, like a star in the sky;
And all that is fairest of all that is fair
Should be all the brighter because I was there.

And tho' I am neither an angel nor bird,
I'll sing the best music that ever was heard—
I'll laugh, and I'll love, and I'll try like a man
To make this world happy as long as I can.

W. G. Tarrant.

We are glad to hear that as a result of the public protest and exposure of policy, which we recently recorded, and of the prompt action of the Nottingham School Board, followed by questions in Parliament, the use of the temporary premises in question by the High Pavement Higher Grade School has been sanctioned by the Board of Education while new buildings are being erected, so that the children in this unsectarian school will not, after all, be driven into the All Saints' National School.

The many correspondents of the Rev. J. Page Hopps are asked to note that after Monday next (April 6) his address will be Kirby Fields, Leicester.

LONDON, APRIL 4, 1903.

A FRESH GIFT.

It will come as an unlooked for happiness to many, and the more delightful on that account, to receive a new volume of sermons by Dr. Martineau.* Twelve years ago he published his "Home Prayers," with the two well-known Services for Public Worship added, of which he spoke in the preface as the last volume that he should offer to his contemporaries. After that came only the Memorial Preface to the volume of sermons by his friend John Hamilton Thom, and the little volume of four sermons, "Faith the Beginning, Self-surrender the Fulfilment, of the Spiritual Life," issued in Clarke's series of "Small Books on Great Subjects." Then at the beginning of 1898 he gave to us, for the first number of a new series of The Inquirer, a sermon on "The Constancy of Nature and the Faithfulness of God," which we had thought might be the last that we should receive from his store. Two years later came the peaceful ending of his wonderful life, and the only expectation we then had was that its full record, with a rich store of his letters, remained to be given to us, as it was in the autumn of last year.

But now comes this new and unexpected gift, a volume to place beside the "Endeavours after the Christian Life" and the "Hours of Thought." In the preface to the first volume of the latter, published in 1876, we read with dismay its opening reference to the first duty said to be incumbent on a retired preacher, "to commit to the flames whatever he has prepared for the pulpit, and secure the world against further tedium from his labours." "Surely not his sermons!" we cried, and rejoiced that at least he had been persuaded "to rescue a few fragments from the process of destruction." Nearly fifty sermons there were in the two volumes of the "Hours of Thought," five others were subsequently published, and here are twenty-two more. So happily he relented, if indeed the thought of that preacher's duty had ever seriously taken hold of him; and now, as his daughters tell us in a brief prefatory note, Dr. Drummond has been able to choose these sermons, which "seem to be the most valuable and characteristic," from a much larger number of the remaining store.

The book has only just come into our hands, and we linger over the delight of having it, and have not yet by any means read all the sermons. But it is the familiar voice :—

> There are a host of natural affections and generous enthusiasms which do not want conversion like a culprit, and will not be beaten like Luther's lazy ass—manly nobleness, womanly tenderness, child-like trust; the patience of knowledge, the inspiration of beauty, the indignation at wrong; all the impulses which enrich our world with truth, art, and public justice; these are left at large by the Protestant classification, and float uneasily between heaven and earth. Flung off by professional religion, as not spiritual, they go about without a blessing; having no call to play sentinel over body and goods, they shrink from the adoption of Law. They belong not to the soul alone, for they love this earth and taught Pagans how to glorify it. They belong not to the body alone, for they conquer its appetites and make it the organ of heroic life. Their very function and joy are found midway, to put a soul into the substance of the world, that its matter may cease to be material, and its spirit cease to be invisible; to work out divine suggestion into form, that something of God may abide with us from morn to night, and we may not be for ever tossed between the frost and fire; to realise conscience in visible life and public expression, that all the holiness in the universe may not be hid in the upper heaven and the secret heart, but may vindicate an Empire in the open business of to-day.

And, again, in the same sermon on "The Ground of National Unity" :—

> What is it then in his nature that renders Man political? He might have common fears inducing him to submit to stronger power; but that would make only a Camp. He might have common interests, leading him to subordinate his personal to the public Will; but that would make only a Company. Not till we say, He has a common sense of justice, do we touch the spring from which the State arises. That which gives efficacy to an external authority over him is the existence and consciousness of a righteous authority within him; and the whole force and significance of Law to him depends on this, that it embodies and interprets the voice of Right within his heart.

These twenty-two sermons cover a wide range of interest. The first six are grouped together under the special title "National Duties," and among the others are such subjects as these: "The Sphere and Spirit of Faith," "The Unjust Steward," "Christ's definition of 'Neighbour,'" "The Life without Sabbath," "Christian Self-Reverence," "Historic Elements of Christian Faith." And then after the sermons, which are printed in a form identical with that of the "Hours of Thought," come a number of Special Addresses given by Dr. Martineau on various occasions in the course of his long ministry. In the second volume of the "Hours of Thought" he included a Confirmation Address, given to the young people of his church before a first communion, and two Communion Addresses. In this new volume there are four more Communion Addresses, and others for Marriage, Christening, and Funerals, and what will be welcomed with special eagerness and gratitude by his old students in Manchester College, nine Valedictory Addresses to the students leaving college, given at those memorable services in Little Portland-street Chapel. Most of these are dated, and one can gratefully recall the very occasion and the men to whom they were addressed. From one of these we will quote in conclusion, and so leave the volume, to return to it a fortnight hence for fuller notice.

In the Address of 1879, the veteran looked back upon the delight of student days, and spoke of the eagerness with which, were it possible to live them over again, he would use their priceless opportunity :—

> You cannot deny that it is a time of peerless privilege, when no heavier burden of duty is laid on you than to let your own mind and soul expand and energise, and survey the field on which they are to live, and draw near to the spirits, divine and human, with whom they are to commune; when the joy of growing faculty meets its own check in the humbling infinitude of truth and intensity of beauty; when the eye of wonder is kept for ever open to new visions, and things seem large and affections deep enough for you to learn and love eternally; and through the literature, philosophy and prophetic voices of many ages you are introduced to the august and gracious company of the wise and saintly. It is a season that comes but once; and happy are they to whom its glory of opportunity is revealed while yet it stays!

But then contrasted with that feeling is the eagerness of the student, devoted to the ministry of religion, at the end of his college course to throw himself into practical work. "For, after all, Thought is for the sake of Life; and cannot, in any healthy mind, be indefinitely fed upon itself, but nurses an irresistible thirst for its proper end." And then he went on to contrast the thought of the scholar in the study of theology with the realities of the religious life, into which the minister must throw himself, in the true prophetic spirit, in which a man may "breathe freely and lift up the voice as witness for God."

> It is a blessed change to have done with philosophy and divines who speculate about heavenly possibilities and find yourself in the train of Christ who lives in their reality; to pass from evidences to Him that is evidenced, and from the strain of intellectual constriction be handed over to the repose of a personal relation ; to revert, with larger mind and deeper soul, to the child's immediate apprehension and simple trust, and "speak that which you do know, and testify that which you have seen." Be it only in the spirit of a divine self-surrender, men will receive the testimony as true.

And finally he points to the difference in the minister's life between self-culture and self-surrender, a truth which of course applies not to ministers alone :—

No self-contemplation, though it be directed on the regulation of mind and character, can ever do more than the negative work of moral police ; warding off the assaults of ill, and keeping the enclosure of the soul swept and garnished, but kindling there no spiritual life, and filling it with no consecration. Refine it as you may, it will only take you, with labouring feet, to the summit of the Law ; if you are ever to launch thence into the free air of the Gospel, you must trust yourself upon the wing of self-forgetfulness and self-devotion. You must cease to choose, and let yourself be chosen ; content to be the organ of that Highest Will that speaks in your compassionate enthusiasms and mingles with the tenderness, the purity, the aspiration of your prayers. Thus to be at disposal, as the ready vehicle of divine light and love, is true fidelity to him who lived and died to do not his own will, but the will of the Father in heaven. That you welcome the movement which drops every Stoical hindrance to this higher prophetic life, is no ingratitude to the past, but only the claim of your full discipleship.

THE RELIGION OF THE RABBIS.—II.

THE LAW.

The characteristic feature of the religion of the Rabbis is what is erroneously called the Law, and it is upon "the Law" that the vials of Christian wrath are poured out. From Paul downwards, the exponents of Christian theory have never wearied of denouncing the Law as a curse and a burden, the cause of that spiritual deadness, that mechanical formalism, that soulless hypocrisy which they associate with the term Rabbinism.

It ought not to need any argument to show that this is an entirely false conception of Judaism, even of Rabbinical Judaism. Yet Schechter has to plead his nation's cause once more, and Schürer "passes by on the other side."

In the short space of this article, I cannot give the whole case to which Schechter has devoted many pages (J.Q.R., 1896, 1-16 ; 363-380). But something may be done, even in three or four columns of The Inquirer.

The word usually translated "Law" is "Torah," which means "teaching." It includes the whole of what God has revealed, as apprehended by the Rabbis. It is His declaration to His people of all that concerns their relation to Him. It includes, therefore, His positive commandments to them ; but it includes much beside. His revelation is contained in the Scriptures, and the name Torah, accordingly, was applied to the whole collection of sacred books. Moses was regarded as the chief agent in making known the Divine Revelation ; therefore the name Torah was applied with special meaning to the Pentateuch. But it was never applied to the legal as distinguished from the historical or narrative portions even of the Pentateuch. If the "Torah" had been only "Law," then, as a Rabbi of the third century pointed out, it would only need to begin with Exodus xii. instead of Genesis i. Schürer is quite wrong in saying that "the prophets and the Hagiographa were not first of all to the Jewish conviction didactic and consolatory works, books of edification and history, but were considered chiefly as Law (Gesetz), the substance of God's claims upon his people" (Schürer, G.V.I., II. 253, quoted by Schechter, J.Q.R., 1896, p. 8, n. 2). The Jews regarded them as "Torah," but certainly not as "Law." They, and the Scriptures generally, served to teach the Israelite, in various ways, what was the relation between his nation and his God ; and direct precept was only one of those ways.

No Jew, however, would deny for a moment that "Torah" did include positive commandment, amongst other things. He would not wish to deny it, for he was not conscious of the dreadful results which are said to have followed from the development of the legal principle in his religion. Schechter points out that the number of commandments actually binding upon any one Jew never amounted to the famous 613. Even if that number be taken seriously, the commandments affecting any given individual would barely amount to a hundred. That number may seem large enough to warrant the belief that the Law must be a burden ; yet the Pharisee did not, as a matter of fact, find it so.

The whole purpose of the legal element in the Torah was the fulfilment of the command "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and soul and strength." Whether the particular ordinance were clearly expressed in Scripture, or deduced by Rabbinical logic, it was only of religious worth as a means of pleasing God, not on its own account. The Rabbis did not care to explain, or even to inquire why God had ordered His people to do certain things, or to refrain from other things. It was enough that such was His will ; the Jew performed the act as a service of God, and not as a drudgery to be gone through. And in place of finding the "Law" a burden, the Jew felt it to be a source of joy. This is certainly the fact, though Christians will not readily believe it. But let anyone read such Psalms as the 119th, and then say if a Pharisee did not really feel joy in the performing of the commandments. The fact that most of the Psalms, if not all, are now supposed to be post-exilic, brings them within the period when the legal element in Judaism became the dominant one, and serves to show that the religion of the Pharisees was by no means crushed out under the weight of the "Law." And if it should be contended that the book of Psalms is no evidence for the spiritual condition of Judaism in the time of Jesus, then let it be remembered that the majority of the Jewish people, from that time down to the present day, have lived under the sway of the "Law," have clung to it in the face of incessant persecution, and have never, until quite recently, relaxed any of their zeal for the due performance of the commandments. If it had ever been the intolerable burden that it is usually supposed to have been, this long and passionate devotion to it of a whole people would be incomprehensible. It might have made hypocrites, it could scarcely have made martyrs.

The way in which the Pharisee regarded the "Law," and the Christian usually misunderstands it, may be illustrated by the case of the Sabbath. Certainly, the Rabbis did hold a theory of the Sabbath widely different from that of Jesus, and were scrupulous about breaking it. But they also had the maxim "the Sabbath is made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." Schechter says (J.Q.R., 1896, p. 372) that they even taught that "the Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath," but I do not think that he intends this as a literal quotation. The Sabbath, it was taught, must always give way for the sake of saving life. Apart, however, from such grave reason, the Sabbath was to be observed by refraining from various acts permissible on other days ; and this restriction, it is thought, must have been irksome and must have led to evasion. But the people who lived under the Sabbath-law did not find it so. Schechter says (p. 373), "The Sabbath is celebrated, by the very people who observed it, in hundreds of hymns, which would fill volumes, as a day of rest and joy, of pleasure and delight, a day in which man enjoys some presentiment of the pure bliss and happiness which are stored up for the righteous in the world to come ; and such tender names were applied as the 'Queen Sabbath,' the 'Bride Sabbath,' the 'Holy dearly-beloved Sabbath.'" "After all," Schechter adds, "the evidence of those who did bear the Sabbath yoke for thousands of years ought to pass for something. The assertion of some scholars that the Rabbis, the framers of these laws, as students leading a retired life, suffered in no way under them, and therefore were unable to realise their oppressive effect upon the great majority of the people, is hardly worth refuting. The Rabbis belonged to the majority, being mostly recruited . . . from the artisan, trading, and labouring classes." The Puritan Sabbath may have been a dismal day, but the blame for that rests on the Puritans, not on the Rabbis. And in regard to the Sabbath, as in regard to every other thing commanded in the "Law," the feeling in the mind of the Jew was mainly joy.

The question naturally arises, suppose a Jew broke a Commandment or failed to fulfil it, what effect did that have upon his spiritual welfare? Paul made it a charge against the whole system of what he called the Law, that under it no righteousness was possible. No man could keep all the Commandments, and if he did not he was a sinner against God. This theory of Judaism was necessary as a foil to Paul's theory of Christianity ; and there might be something in it, if Paul had not entirely ignored the non-legal part of Judaism. The Jew regarded the Commandments as being what God would have him do, or refrain from doing ; and to disobey the Commandments was a sin for which he needed the forgiveness of God. Paul said that under the law there was no hope for the sinner. The Rabbi said there was, and what is more he knew by experience that there was. The Rabbi did not call God his "Father in Heaven" without meaning something by it, and what he meant was, amongst other things, that God would, and did, forgive His children when they repented of their wrong-doing. The Rabbi did not need Paul to tell him that the mere precept of the law had no spiritual value or power, could not enable a man to fulfil it, or give him peace if he broke it. The Rabbi looked from the law to the law-giver, or rather, from the expression of his Father's will to the Father himself. He prayed to God for help to do His will, to serve Him in those ways which it had pleased Him to appoint (and in whatever other ways the conscience and zeal of the worshipper might suggest); and if he failed, as "there is no man that sinneth not," he asked God to forgive him and help him to try again. If Paul had dealt fairly with Judaism, he would not have ignored this essential element in it, of whose existence he could not possibly be unaware. And if he had not ignored it he would have found much greater difficulty than he did in showing the superiority of his Christianity. As it is, what he describes or implies in his Epistles is but a travesty of Judaism, and would be worth no attention if it were not that the great authority of Paul has done grievous injustice to the Jews. Surely Paul, as a zealous convert, was the last man from whom a fair and sympathetic account could be expected of the religion he had left. Whether that be so or not, it is quite certain to those who know Judaism, Rabbinical Judaism, that he has not given such an account.

Upon the very point which Paul makes the ground of his condemnation of Judaism—namely, its doctrine of sin and repentance, the Rabbinical literature lays almost greater stress than upon any other element of religious life. It is, doubtless, true that the Rabbis were not the equals of Paul in subtlety of argument; they were, on the whole, very simple-minded men, and took no delight in trying to sound the obscure depths of the spiritual life. But they knew what the love of God meant, and the joy of serving Him, and the peace of being forgiven by Him. If they thanked God "that they were not as other men are," what is that but to say "By the grace of God I am what I am." And to say that they meant only a self-righteous boast is to impute motives without warrant. I do not mean to say that all Jews lived up to the ideal of their religion. That could not be said even of Christians. There have been hypocrites amongst the adherents of both religions. But I do mean to say that the ideal of Rabbinical Judaism was a noble one; and that those who followed it did live a religious life which need fear no comparison with the religious life of the average Christian in any respect whatever. The form of Judaism as embodied in "Torah" is, of course, very different from the form of Christianity. But the Jew who lived under the Torah had a soul and a conscience, a will to serve God and a delight in His service, knew the meaning of prayer and praise; and if he cared little for doctrinal precision, he cared a great deal for practical goodness, for making his every-day life a part of his service of God. The worst thing that can be said of Judaism is that it is, by its limitations of national tradition, not fitted to be a universal religion. On its own lines, and for those who have inherited it, Judaism can offer to them quite as much as they would find in Christianity. And Christians would better act up to the obligations of the name they bear if they learned to honour, though they may not profess, the religion of the Rabbis, and if they were willing to listen to those who speak for the Jewish nation, saying, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?"

Out of a sense of deep obligation to many Jews, Scribes and Pharisees of old time, who have taught me much, I offer this small contribution towards the cause of justice to them at the hands of their Christian brethren.

THE RESPONSE TO THE ANONYMOUS DONOR.

Sir,—Your advertising columns this week will bear witness to the wonderfully prompt response made by many generous friends of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the splendid challenge of the munificent benefactor who promised an annual subscription of £1,000 if others would meet his offer with new and additional subscriptions of £2,000 a year. The whole annual amount has been promised prior to any general and widely-circulated public appeal.* As President of the Association for the current year, I ask leave publicly to express in your columns my own deep gratitude, first, to the initiator of the movement, and, next, to all those who have so generously responded to his call. And I know that my own gratitude will be echoed by the other officers, and by every member of the Executive Committee.

It only remains to add that the fund is by no means closed, and that new or increased subscriptions will be welcomed from all friends of "the principles of Unitarian Christianity." Innumerable opportunities present themselves for educational work by tongue and pen both at home, in the colonies, and abroad. The effective work of the Association in the promotion of theological enlightenment and liberal religion will be limited, I believe, solely by the means at their disposal.

May I add that it is by a pure coincidence that the present movement synchronises with the presentation of the proposals of the National Conference Committee? I believe that the anonymous donor held back his offer till the appeal initiated by the Conference for a Ministers' Superannuation Fund should have been carried to a successful issue, in order that neither movement should interfere with the other. His challenge, however, would probably have been published a few months earlier but for my own unfortunate illness in the autumn. In any case I am quite secure in saying that neither he nor any of those connected with the administration of the funds of the Association have any but the heartiest goodwill to the Conference; and I believe that they all unfeignedly rejoice in any good service which that body may be enabled to render to our churches, whatever view any particular individual may take of any particular proposal. For indeed the permanent, underlying, and dominating fact is that "we are all members one of another." And so in mutual goodwill, confidence, and respect, let us go forward!

THE CONFERENCE SECRETARY.

Sir,—We all gratefully appreciate Dr. Blake Odgers as the gentle humorist of our meetings. How often have we been thankful to him for lighting up a dull hour by touches of genial wit and fancy? But, perhaps, even he never achieved a finer or a more whimsical stroke than in his suggested amendment to the Conference Committee's proposal on the appointment of a secretary. Consider! The National Conference, with its 300 churches, its Doctors of Divinity, its great scholars, its manifold labours as the organ of our churches, with difficult and delicate problems waiting its efforts, is to have for its executive arm and its official representative before men and angels a third-class clerk at a salary not exceeding £100 a year! It is exquisitely funny, and the Doctor is to be congratulated on his merry quip. It is true, Mr. Editor, that a slow-witted friend at my elbow suggests as an extremely remote contingency that the proposal may be intended seriously. I decline to entertain the prosaic idea. If I did I should be driven to the painful conclusion that it was intended to turn the Conference into ridicule and reduce it to impotence. But as that cannot possibly be the Doctor's purpose we are left at ease to enjoy the humour of the situation. And if, Sir, you ask me, "Why, then, do you write?" I reply, first to express my gratitude, and, secondly, out of sheer kindness to those dull, although often amiable, people (a numerous company) who never know what there is to be amused at until the joke is explained to them.

Joseph Wood.

Birmingham, March 31.

Sir,—It is earnestly to be hoped that the amendment of which Mr. Blake Odgers has given notice to the motion of the committee relating to the appointment of a paid secretary will receive the decisive condemnation of the members of the Conference; or that, better still, it will be withdrawn in response to a wide expression of dissent. What does the amendment to be moved by our popular K.C. amount to? That the growth of the Conference must be checked, its future development and consolidation must be hampered, and its organisation be kept within such narrow limits that its affairs shall be merely a matter of petty cash! Mr. Odgers, doubtless, knows how to present his case; but I venture to say that that is the plain English of his proposal. To me, I confess, there is something almost indecent in this threatened blow against the development and utility of the Conference in the service of our churches, at the very time when an urgent appeal is being made for large sums to fill the coffers of the sister association, the B. and F.U.A. Why should the one be enriched and the other damaged? We need the services of both, to put fresh force and life into our religious effort and give unity and coherence to the expression of our ideals. Why, then, should the friends of the one pursue a senseless and harmful vendetta against the natural development of the other? Mr. Blake Odgers is, I see, a vice-president of the Conference; and, I suppose, wishes well to its work and influence But I confess that his threatened action reveals a curious kind of enthusiasm for an extension of its helpfulness and power. It reminds one of the well-known couplet which a brother minister quoted to me the other day in another connection:

> It is all very well to dissemble your love,
> But why did you kick me downstairs?

I hope it is not too late to make an earnest appeal to Mr. Odgers to reconsider the position he has taken up for the sake of the peace and progress of the religious movement that we all have at heart. Personally, I should like to see both the B. and F.U.A. and the Conference strong, rich, and active bodies; well equipped to carry on their work, working in friendly co-operation, and with their eyes fixed upon the poverty, weakness, and discouragement within our churches, and the sin, ignorance, and indifference without, rather than upon the schemes and animosities of rival factions which will, if they are pursued, split our churches from end to end and consummate the ruin of our movement. I am delighted to find that the B. and F.U.A. has got the money it desired. I hope some of the wealthy friends of the Conference will show a healthy spirit of emulation, and by their generous gifts put the Conference on a business footing and help to make it an efficient force for unity and progress in our midst. I wonder whether, if Martineau had been alive, there would have been such a proposal as to put a "£100 a year man" at the helm of our great and inspiring National Conference work? The Conference is to celebrate its coming-of-age next month in the city of its nativity. Cannot we all unite to give it a better start for its manhood's career than a niggardly £100 per annum? If not, what will our brethren in the other Nonconformist Churches think of us, I wonder?

PASSIVE OBEDIENCE.

Sir,—The special report of the Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire on the Education Act is an important document, and I rejoice that so representative a body has expressed itself without reserve on a matter of grave and urgent politics. I trust their example of refusing to burk great social issues will be followed by other District Associations and by the National Conference. It is usually, I fear, only moral weakness or mutual intolerance, disguised as a concern for the high interests of spiritual religion, that dictates a policy of silence on these vital questions.

But while I hail with welcoming the fact that the Committee of the Provincial Assembly has liberated its soul, I desire, if only to encourage others, to say that I for my part have no hesitation in accepting the policy of passive resistance—or, as I should prefer to say, of passive obedience. I shall, of course, ultimately be constrained to pay all my rates. But the denominational portion of the Education rate I shall not assist the rate-gatherer to collect. I shall, on the other hand, not offer him any resistance. I shall passively but not actively obey the law, letting it take the rate by the civil process of stripping our home in the presence of my wife and children and domestic helpers. My reasons for taking this course are many, and I should only weary your readers by arguing the matter out at length. I would, however, say that I do not consider it justifiable to resist a law or even to refuse active obedience to it on the bare ground that that law, judged by an ideal standard, is unjust. If citizens were to rebel against every little deviation from ideal justice, government would, at the present stage of social development, be rendered impossible. Every moralised being must, of course, "conscientiously object" to every such deviation, however trivial, and it is his duty to get it rectified by the usual methods of reform. I object then to make voluntary payment of this portion of the rate, not because I have one particular objection which is "conscientious" and somehow sacrosanct (in a sense in which other practical objections are imagined not to be), but because this particular objection arises from a specially intense protest occasioned by a felt injustice of unusual magnitude inflicted by methods that call forth the sternest resentment. In a word, I justify my objection, not on the ground of a unique kind of moral authority, but on the ground of a special degree of moral indignation and intensity of protest.

Students of treatises like Sidgwick's Elements of Politics and Green's Lectures on Political Obligation will not need to be told that they admit with the utmost candour, if also with cautious safeguards, that even in the freest and most democratically governed country there may arise a right and a duty to resist a law constitutionally enacted. To decide when precisely that right and duty do actually arise is a matter of great difficulty. But I am convinced that for me at least—I judge no one else—a duty has arisen that prompts me, if not to resist, not actively to assist the administration of certain provisions of this Act. In taking this attitude I am fortified to find that a similar attitude on the part of my compatriots during the recent Anti-Tithe War in Wales was justified by Mr. Justice Wills in a charge to the grand jury at Beaumaris Assizes.

> Those who objected to the law made their protest by suffering these distraints to be made and submitting like gentlemen and Christians. . . . If, however, the people said they were not willing to pay for things which they did not like, and that they submitted to distraints so as to show their protest against the law, they would be perfectly justified in doing so. As long as they did this nothing could be said against them. This was the kind of protest by which some of our best improvements in the law, which years and years ago were found to be oppressive, were brought about.

Such a protest I am resolved to make. If I look at the past of this Education Act, I cannot help seeing that it is a clerical scheme avowedly conceived by the Joint Committee of the Convocations of Canterbury and York and accepted by the Government after distinct and deliberate representations (which I am prepared if challenged to quote) on the part of both Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain—representations which led the public to believe at the last general election that they could safely vote for their war-policy without compromising their views on any social question. This Act comes to me as the measure of the infamous betrayal of the public confidence, and my proposed action seems to me the best way of bringing home to Government my detestation and abhorrence of their dishonourable conduct.

If I look at the effect of this Act in the present, I see that it subjects thousands of persons, who will henceforth be civil servants of the State, to an odious and insufferable system of religious tests. To this I "will not submit" without protest, whatever my co-religionists who drink the toast of "civil and religious liberty" may do.

I look again at the probable effect of this Act on the future, and to me it is quite beyond debate that if Clauses 8 and 9 are given time and opportunity to work, we shall have an enormous increase of denominationalism and of that political clericalism which has been justly described as the insidious enervator of national strength. There is one way of preventing this result, and that is the short way of a peaceable but stern revolt.

Now I do not profess or propose here to argue out these points. I do not marshal all the single arguments that might be brought forward. Much less do I seek to present them in their cumulative force—true as it is that though every single argument by itself were unconvincing, yet all together might form an incontestable case. My desire is simply to record convictions which are among the most earnest, the most solemn, and the most passionate that have ever governed any action of my life.

A report of Unitarian work in the Khasi Hills, India, from Mr. Kissor Singh, tells of a successful conference at Nongtalang, in January, lasting for three days. Among the speakers at a Sunday meeting were Mr. Mar Singh, V. Singbor, Rev. David Edwards, and Mr. Kissor Singh. The last two spoke of the "Coming of the Kingdom of God" in the Khasi Hills. The Kingdom of God will come, they said, by the awakening of the spiritual needs of the people. Thirsting after God in private devotion and in public worship, practical sympathy with our fellow men, are the prominent features of the coming of the Kingdom. In the afternoon there was street singing and preaching. In the evening a board meeting was held, in which the account of the Mission fund was read and passed, and other business transacted. The intended removal of Mr. Kissor Singh to Shillong will, it is hoped, call out fresh energies in the members of the Jowai church, who will no longer have him to depend upon. The first part of the new "Khasi Hymn-book," consisting of services, selected passages for reading, and readings with musical responses is reported as in the press. The responses are printed with tunes in the Tonic Solfa notation.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

It is so long since I ventured to send the editor a Provincial Letter, that it may perhaps be necessary to repeat the proviso that it is but a limited district that is here treated, not by any means the whole of the Saxon Wessex, and there are but few Unitarian places of worship in it; or if any of our friends prefer the phrase, places of worship attended by acknowledged Unitarians. So that there is not much to chronicle year by year, for these said stalwarts, though they be faithful, yet be few.

Still the time has perhaps come when some word from our scattered sprinklings may find a place in this series of records.

Our Twentieth Century Fund has been raised and invested in the names of trustees, and provision has been made that the income shall be applied to the general purposes of the Southern Unitarian Association.

The use made of it so far has been to defray the expenses of missions at Southampton and Poole. These missions are intended to be purely religious, not theological or controversial at all; their object is to deepen the spiritual life among our own people; if by that means we can influence the outside world it will be well, but that is a purely secondary object. Mr. Lambelle was the missioner at Southampton. Careful preparations were made in the way of advertisement and suitable hymns and music. The fogs in their courses fought against our Sisera, there was hardly one clear night during the whole week of the mission, but yet the services were felt to be uplifting and strengthening, and the result was thought to be so satisfactory that it was decided to make a similar experiment at Poole last autumn, with Mr. Daplyn as the missioner.

The experience gained at Southampton suggested slight modifications in the plan of action, and the success of this effort was very marked. The total of attendances during the week came to nearly a thousand, and it was conclusively demonstrated to those who did not know it before, that real religion is as vital an interest to Unitarians as it is to other people, and that our care for men's souls is as great as for their brains. At first sight there may seem some difficulty in adapting our conceptions of religion to the methods of Revivalism, and no doubt there is, but with earnest and devoted men difficulty is only encountered to be overcome, and it was so in these instances. These mission services would very much astonish and enlighten a certain friend of ours who once said that Unitarian sermons were always controversial and directed to proving the folly of Orthodoxy.

They were full of positive affirmative religion, there was not a word of controversy in them from beginning to end, and the testimony of those on the spot is that they were full of benefit, and that they have really confirmed the feeble knees.

Of a different character was the recent visit of the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, to Ringwood, Bournemouth, Poole, Parkstone, Wareham, and Portsmouth. This was distinctly controversial, and we owe it to the generosity and initiative of the B. and F.U.A. The mission opened at Ringwood, where quite a crowd, for our little town, assembled in the old chapel, joined heartily in the service, and listened spellbound to Mr. Street's powerful discourse on "Our Father." Many Wesleyans were present, a gratifying sign of the weakening of old prejudice. Not so many years ago, they would have been afraid to venture within the walls, lest they shall fall on them. This auspicious beginning was followed up by a series of successful services at the places mentioned. We feel deeply indebted to Mr. Street for his kindly interest in us, and for the inspiration of earnestness and vigour he has given us, which we trust will be lasting.

One of the places mentioned is Parkstone, where a new mission station has been founded by the generosity of Mr. William Carter at Emerson Hall, in a district remote from churches and chapel. The services are under the direction of Mr. Bushrod, of Southampton, than whom there could not be found a more suitable man. A clear head, an incisive speech, and a thorough knowledge of the Bible, united to a keen sympathy with humanity, are qualifications which account for the success of this movement which is doing great good in the neighbourhood.

The hand of death has been heavy on our churches. The venerable Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain has been taken from Southampton, and Poole has hardly recovered from the shock of the sudden death of the Rev. E. S. Anthony, whose simple piety and quiet, steady earnest work have borne fruit in the solidifying of the congregation. The omens are favourable for a happy and useful pastorate for the newly-appointed minister, Mr. Burton, of Liverpool, who may feel confident of a hearty and sympathetic welcome from the churches of the district.

Here in Ringwood we enjoy the great boon of visits during the vacations from the students of Manchester College, Oxford. This may be reckoned among the advantages of the removal of the College to Oxford, at all events to us, who benefit by the fresh breezes of youth and fervour and University culture, while we trust the young men gain something by the country air, and a little foretaste of practical work. In this way we feel we are linked with the great world through our affectionate remembrance of the earlier days of several of our ministers up and down the land.

As each one goes, we think ah! that is our favourite, we shall never see another like him, and lo! we take to the next just as much. The samples we have had of the School of the Prophets fill us with hope for the future. For it is not merely as supplies on Sunday that they come. They stay here during the vacation, and mingle with us and become a part of our lives, and so we come to know them.

J. Cogan Conway.

A circular letter signed by the President of the Wesleyan Conference has been sent out to all the Wesleyan ministers and Sunday-school authorities asking them to devote a Sunday in the early spring, preferably April 19, to special effort on behalf of the better observance of the Sabbath. The letter alleges that powerful forces are at work tending to lower the sanctity of the Lord's Day and to change it into a day of mere amusement.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Belfast: Mount Pottinger.—The Rev. W. J. Davies has just concluded a series of six doctrinal lectures on "Unitarianism." On Friday, March 27 Mr. Davies lectured on "A Tour in Hungary and Transylvania," illustrated by lime-light views, kindly lent for the occasion by the Rev. E. C. Jones, M.A., of Bradford, and Mr. and Mrs. Davies sang four popular Hungarian songs in Hungarian, the choir also rendering some Hungarian music. Both lecture and music were very much appreciated.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The annual spring sermons were preached last Sunday by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., when large congregations assembled at both services. In order to defray the balance of expense incurred in decorating the chapel and making sundry necessary repairs, a special effort was made, and the collections for the day amounted to the satisfactory total of £121 10s. 6d.

Flowery Field.—A Sale of Work was held in the Sunday-school on Saturday, March 28. The opener was Mr. Thomas Beebey, J.P., a prominent member of the Primitive Methodist body. The chair was taken by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., and amongst those present were Mrs. Ashton and Miss Margaret Ashton; also friends from nearly every religious body in the town. The object of the sale was to clear off a deficit of £68 19s. 6d. in the working expenses of the last three years. The net proceeds were about £55.

Framlingham.—On Wednesday, March 25, a lecture entitled "What will be the Effect of the Education Act on the National Life?" was given in the Old Meeting House by the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., of Norwich.

Glasgow: St. Vincent-street.—The anniversary sermon was preached on Sunday morning, March 29, by the Rev. James Forrest, M.A., his subject being "Unitarians and the Coming Conflict of Faith." Immediately after the service the annual business meeting of the congregation was held in the church. Mr. R. Stewart, Chairman of Committee, presided, and there was a full attendance of members. The reports submitted showed that the gratifying and renewed interest manifested within the last year or two in the various departments of congregational life and work not only continued, but was steadily on the increase. This was apparent from the growth in the membership, the greater attendance at the services, the larger amount of the ordinary collections, the prosperity of the Sunday-school and minister's class, as well as in other branches of congregational activity. The treasurer's statement showed that the sums raised and expended for all purposes within the year amounted to a total of over £700. The report was approved and ordered to be printed, together with the thoughtful and stimulating discourse to which the congregation had just listened from their minister. Further business having been completed, the usual vote of thanks terminated a very hopeful and satisfactory meeting.

Heaton Moor.—The last social evening, on March 25, was felt to be the most successful and sociable of the season. A number of friends who have not hitherto attended on similar occasions were present, and the Rev. Priestley Prime expressed the welcome of the congregation to five new members who have joined since the previous social gathering.

Leeds: Hunslet.—On Saturday, March 28, a most enjoyable minstrel entertainment was given by Miss Thornton and her friends in the schoolroom. This is the second year she has done this, and, if possible, it was more highly appreciated than the first. There was a full audience, many strangers being present, and the financial result will be a substantial addition to the funds.

Kilmarnock.—A Sale of Work, for which the Ladies' Sewing Society had been toiling hard for months, was held in the Hall of Clerk's-lane Free Christian Church on March 27 and 28, mainly for the purpose of enabling the church to close its financial year free of debt. This was more than accomplished, as the amount raised (£59) exceeded requirements and expectations.

London: Peckham.—Among the various efforts recently made to increase the funds of the Avondale-road Church and its affiliated institutions, none has proved more popular than an entertainment given by members of the Sunday-school Guild, under the direction of Miss Carter, on Saturday last. The schoolroom was quite filled by a most appreciative audience, and the pecuniary result was highly satisfactory. Of the many admirable features of the evening, an action-song, entitled "The Japanese Umbrella," given by infants, most prettily and appropriately costumed, elicited enthusiastic applause. The varied entertainment closed with the cantata, "The Court of Queen Summergold," in which again both performance and appointments won admiration.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual conversazione was held at Oldham on Saturday last. Owing to change of date, the attendance suffered somewhat, but a very pleasant evening was spent. About 120 persons were present at tea, after which the Committee met and discussed, inter alia, the question of week-night services for scholars. The President, the Rev. H. S. Tayler, took the chair at the after-proceedings, supported by the Revs. J. A. Pearson, W. Harrison, and A. Cobden Smith, and Mr. A. Slater. Mr. Smith attended as representative of the Manchester District S.S.A., and delivered an interesting address on bazaar and other matters. Among the other ministers present were the Revs. H. B. Smith, W. C. Hall, and A. R. Andreae.

Nottingham.—The High Pavement Historical Society held the closing meeting of the winter session in the schoolrooms on Tuesday evening, March 24, when a very interesting lantern lecture was given by Mr. Harry Gill, entitled "The Stately Homes of England." The President (Mr. J. C. Warren) occupied the chair, and there was a fair attendance.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—On Monday evening, in connection with the Literary and Social Union, a lecture was given by Mr. Frederick A. Smith, on "The Life and Work of Gounod," with musical illustrations contributed by several friends. During an interval, occasion was taken to present a gold watch to Mr. W. R. Stevenson, as a mark of appreciation of his twenty-one years' service as voluntary organist. In making the presentation, the Rev. A. H. Dolphin said he did it on behalf of the whole congregation, who most cheerfully subscribed towards the purchase of the watch, and wished that Mr. Stevenson might live long to wear it, and be reminded of their appreciation of his services. Mr. W. Guest, Chairman of Committee, Mr. C. H. Hilder, and Mr. F. A. Smith, members of the choir, also added their testimony to the splendid work Mr. Stevenson had done, and was still doing, for the congregation in his position of organist and choirmaster. Mr. W. Sinclair proposed that the best thanks of the meeting should be given to the lecturer and the friends who had so admirably assisted him. This was cordially passed, and a very pleasant evening was thus brought to a close.

Torquay.—The spring session of week-evening meetings was brought to a most successful close by a concert on Monday last. Lectures have been delivered on the subjects of "Marriage," "The Garden City Scheme," and "Scotland and the Scotch," and the whole series, including the two concerts, has been greatly appreciated. The popularity of the concerts shows that high-class music, adequately rendered, is an irresistible attraction for a large number of people. The Rev. A. E. O'Connor, during part of February and March, gave several sermons at the Sunday morning services on "The Books of Moses and Modern Criticism," and he has just concluded a special series of Sunday evening addresses on "Poets of the Nineteenth Century," the poets selected for review being Shelley, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Lowell, and Whittier. Special means are being taken to make the services better known with encouraging results.

How many wrong thoughts of others, false estimates of things, and self-delusions are the result of prejudices formed hastily, or from some bias of feeling, from drawing conclusions on insufficient knowledge, or too great confidence in our own judgment.—Maria Hare.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE proceedings of the National Conference, which meets in Liverpool, April 21-24, are to be published in full, in two successive numbers of THE INQUIRER, April 25 and May 2, which will be enlarged and practically given over to this purpose. The President's Address, the Conference Sermon, a report of the welcome to foreign delegates, and the Wednesday papers are to appear in the issue of April 25, and the rest of the proceedings, including a report of the business meeting, in the following number. Orders for extra copies of these two numbers should be sent in without delay.

FURTHER subscriptions to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in addition to the list advertised last week, have now completed the £2,000 required, and with the one great subscription from the "President's Friend," the whole income of £3,000 a year is secured for the scheme of new and enlarged work. But the subscription list, as the President stated last week, is by no means closed; there is ample scope for more good work, if further means are forthcoming. And there is another appeal, which ought to be made to the churches. Money they generously give. Let them also subscribe some more good men to be devoted to the common cause!

THE course of lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," delivered with so much acceptance during the last few years by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter in University cities and other important towns of England, Scotland, and Wales, has now been elaborated in book form, and is to be published by Messrs. Longmans, Green and Co., on April 21, as a substantial volume (demy 8vo., pp. 528, 10s. 6d. net). The titles of the eight lectures are as follows:—"The Struggle for Freedom of Inquiry," "The Revised Version," "Changed Views of the Law," "Changed Views of Prophecy," "The Gospels and the Early History of Christianity," "The First Three Gospels: (i) Literary Investigation, (ii) Historical Investigation," "The Fourth Gospel," "The Bible and the Church." The attendance at the lectures in many places showed how eager is the interest in these subjects among earnest and thoughtful people, and the volume now completed is sure of many grateful readers.

THE Government's Education Bill for London, brought in by Sir William Anson on Tuesday, appears to have been received by its supporters practically in silence, and by the Opposition with indignation and derision. "A Metropolitan Board of Schools with just enough flavour of representation in it to prevent its being classed in the category of the Metropolitan Board of Works" was Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's characterisation of the proposed authority. "The Worst of the Water Boards," says the Daily News. "Is the Government riding for a fall?" asked Mr. Ernest Gray, on the Conservative side. "It will have the ridicule of the whole of London poured on its head in this preposterous attempt to amalgamate authorities." And he proved his sincerity by voting against the first reading of the Bill. The new authority to supersede the School Board for London is to consist of 97 members, of whom only 36 are to be members of the County Council, 31 of the City and Borough Councils, 25 representatives of other bodies or expert educationists, and 5 members of the superseded School Board. Criticism of the Bill we will leave until it is in our hands. Authority is evidently to be divided in an extraordinary way, and the Bill would seem to have got in the House the reception it deserved.

DR. HENRY WACE, rector of St. Michael's, Cornhill, who has been appointed Dean of Canterbury, in succession to the late Dean Farrar, was formerly Professor of Ecclesiastical History, and from 1884 to 1897 Principal of King's College, London. He was also for many years Chaplain and Preacher of Lincolns-inn, and was editor with the late Sir William Smith of the "Dictionary of Christian Biography." Born in 1836, he is by five years the junior of the late Dean.

MANCHESTER celebrated the jubilee of its Public Free Libraries on April 2 with public meetings at the Whitworth Hall of Owens College and at the Free Trade Hall, and a luncheon given by the Lord Mayor and Free Libraries Committee at the Town Hall. Besides the local magnates there were many guests of distinction, including Sir Lewis Morris, Dr. Garnett, Sir J. Crichton Browne and Lord Avebury. Still more memorable was the gathering at the opening of the first Manchester Free Library at Campfield in 1852, when John Bright, Dickens, Thackeray, Bulwer Lytton, Monckton Milnes and Lord Shaftesbury were among the speakers.

MANCHESTER was the first town to avail itself of the Public Libraries Act of 1850. Warrington had a Museum and Reference Library from 1843, Leicester had a rate-supported Museum from 1844, Salford had its Peel Park Library and Museum a year or two before the passing of the Ewart Act; but it was Manchester which first gave effect to that Act of establishing a popular Lending and Reference Library. Thomas Greenwood, the veteran advocate of Free Libraries, records with enthusiasm in one of his books the proceedings at the opening on Thursday, Sept. 2, 1852, when Charles Dickens declared that he had long had considerable anxiety to know what the "Manchester school" was which in Parliament and elsewhere was so often the subject of discussion. "Now, ladies and gentlemen," said he, "I have solved this difficulty by finding here to-day that the Manchester School is a great free school, bent on carrying instruction to the poorest hearths."

THE Rev. Dr. S. H. Mellone, of Holywood, co. Down, who is well known to our readers through his helpful contributions to these columns on philosophical and religious subjects, as well as through other published works, has been appointed Examiner in Philosophy in the University of London. Dr. Mellone held a similar post for three years at St. Andrews. Our hearty congratulations on his new appointment!

IN a sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit on "Revelation: Past, Present, and to Come," the Rev. Charles Hargrove welcomes the recent excursion of the German Emperor into the realm of theological discussion, and comments on the distinction drawn between two kinds of revelation, "one continuous and to some extent historical, and one purely religious." This distinction, as Harnack showed in the article, a translation of which appears in the current number of the Contemporary, does not really hold, and Mr. Hargrove in his sermon makes the same point.

"THE Autobiography of an Agnostic on his Journey to Theism" is the subject of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's sermon in the April number of Sermons for the Day. The actual document on which the sermon is based can now be had from the Liverpool Booksellers' Company, 70, Lord-street (2½d. by post), and is entitled "Groping to God," by an ex-Agnostic. Its story of pathetic human experience, leading up into the light of faith, has the genuine interest of personal testimony as to matters of vital moment to religion and life.

The April Seed-Sower is a special National Conference number; with interesting notes as to the origin of the Conference, its first meeting in Liverpool in 1882, and the programme of the coming meetings. There are good illustrations of the Hope-street and Ullet-road Churches and of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth (which lovers of early Puritan history, in Old and New England alike, should not fail to see). There are also portraits of three leading ministers who are to take part in the Conference proceedings, and ghosts of two others. One of the ghosts is labelled "Mr. Jupp"; but do not let anyone suppose that our friend, who writes as he does in this week's Inquirer, and speaks, as he will speak at the Conference, is any such shade from the nether world. One of the "children of light," if ever there was one!

The Unitarian World is strong in foreign notes and news, and the April number does not fall short in that respect. There is an article by the Rev. A. E. O'Conner on "Church Government in France," and an article on "Liberal Christianity in the Danish National Church," by Miss Westenholz, translated by Mr. O'Conner from Lys over Landet. We are delighted to hear that Miss Westenholz is to be in this country in Whit-week, and will read a paper at the B. and F.U.A. Conference on "The World-Mission of Unitarianism."

We are greatly indebted to Mr. Addis for the interesting account of M. Loisy's writings, which will be found in our present issue. If we had to take sides, we should doubtless find ourselves, with M. Loisy's critical heresies, under the lash of Mr. Addis's disapproval, and also inclined to choose rather "the repulsive austerity of Puritan services" than the "costly vestments," &c., of the Roman ritual, for which Mr. Addis has so much sympathy. But for that very reason we are the more grateful for the interest and value of his contribution to these columns.

Yorkshire Unitarian Union: County Bazaar.—The bazaar committee are much encouraged by the generous response which their appeal is meeting with, especially at Leeds, where over £1,000 has already been subscribed towards the £5,000 aimed at, and the value of about £600 has been promised in goods for the Mill Hill stalls. Definite promises of help have also been received from other churches. Bradford will contribute £150 in goods, Dewsbury £100, Hunslet £100, Holbeck £50, and Pudsey £50. Substantial assistance is also expected from Halifax, Huddersfield, Hull, Idle, Lydgate, Rotherham, Scarborough, Sheffield, Wakefield, and other places, most of which are represented on the general committee.

THE VILLAGE PROBLEM.

Sir,—I am greatly indebted to you and Mr. Harwood for your kind comments on my small book, "The Village Problem."

There is just one point in the notice upon which I should like to say a word or two, if I may.

It would, I think, be inferred from one passage in the review that general land nationalisation is involved in my proposals for village regeneration. That is not so. What is proposed in the book is merely that the land necessary for the development of the future village shall be the property of the State, and shall become so either by State purchase—entirely in accordance with the Ten Commandments—or by private gift to the State for the specific purpose. That, of course, would be land nationalisation, but on a scale strictly limited to the requirements of the village to be established. I cannot imagine any reasonable person trying to resuscitate the village on any other basis.

George F. Millin.

THE PRIESTLEY MEMORIAL.

Sir,—The Rev. Joseph Wood desires to celebrate the centenary of the death of his illustrious predecessor, the Rev. Joseph Priestley, by founding a Priestley lectureship. We believe that the majority of the Unitarian laity in the Midlands would prefer that the memorial should take the form of a few more churches. Mr. Matthews suggests that a church is needed at Erdington, and gives his reasons for saying so. We have no doubt he is right.

A congregation has been in existence four years at Moseley (a large growing suburb of Birmingham), strong enough, if they possessed a church building, to be entirely self-supporting.

The sum of money Mr. Wood mentions as necessary would provide a church at each of these places.

We hope Mr. Wood may be induced to reconsider the form of his memorial.

The Committee of Our Father's Church, worshipping at the Moseley and Balsall Heath Institute, Birmingham.

A. H. Shaw, Secretary.

A JOINT RESPONSIBILITY.

Sir,—In reading the Rev. J. Hamilton Drummond's letter in your issue of 28th ult. on "A Remedy for our Religious Ineffectiveness," I notice (as I always notice in letters from our ministers dealing with this and similar subjects) that the responsibility for the non-success of our churches is laid entirely upon the shoulders of the laity. This, of course, is nothing new. If our churches lack spiritual energy—it is the fault of the laity. If as a religious force in public life our churches are ineffective—it is the fault of the laity. If our congregations are dwindling—again it is the fault of the laity, or, to be more precise, the fault of those long-suffering, much-abused institutions, the church committees. No doubt the back of the laity is broad enough to bear the entire load of responsibility; still one would think if there is any blame attaching to our churches for their ineffectiveness, our ministers would, from a sense of justice if not from generosity, be willing to share in it.

Loyalty amongst co-workers is always desirable, but such excessive loyalty as exists amongst our ministers tends to make more pronounced that distinction between ministry and laity (already more pronounced with us than in many orthodox communities) which is so deleterious to the highest interests of our churches.

There is one other matter that closely affects the laity, and to which I should like to allude—namely, the practice of admitting only signed correspondence to your columns. This is practically to muzzle the laity and to give to The Inquirer an exclusively ministerial tone; which result is not, I am sure, in the true interests of The Inquirer or in the broader interests our churches generally.

That the laity should have no outlet for opinion on Church-life and kindred subjects (for it is obvious that only under anonymity could such opinion be given) is not in accordance with those principles of freedom of thought and speech that are, as I understand it, inseparably bound up with Unitarianism.

Percival M. Lee.

Torquay, April 6.

P.S.—With Mr. Drummond's suggestion that the old-fashioned Committee should be superseded by a Church Council I heartily concur.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE.

Sir,—May I state that the report of the Committee, with programme and other papers, has been posted to all delegates—ministerial and lay—whose names have been sent in from the various congregations?

The reduced travelling fares apply to visitors as well as delegates, but a special form is necessary, which will be furnished to all applicants in return for a stamped addressed envelope.

Chas. Fenton, Acting Hon. Sec.

Cranford, Vineyard Hill, Wimbledon, April 7.

HOSPITALITY.

Sir,—I should be glad if you would announce in the next edition of The Inquirer that particulars of hospitality provided for ministers and delegates will be sent out to them, together with tickets for the various meetings and guide-book, before Tuesday next, the 14th inst., and that should any guest be omitted they are requested to immediately communicate with the secretaries, 19, Sweeting-street, Liverpool. B. P. Burroughs.

The National Conference.—At the unanimous request of the committee of the Sunday School Association, its representative at the National Conference (Rev. James Harwood) will move:—"That the whole question of appointing a paid secretary and a pastor-at-large be referred to a future meeting of the Conference to be called after the churches have had an opportunity of considering the proposals made, and instructing their delegates, if they wish to do so."

LITERATURE.

M. LOISY AS BIBLICAL CRITIC.*

M. Loisy is the most distinguished in the band of French ecclesiastics who are striving so hard to reconcile their Church with the methods and results of historical criticism. The books noted below mark the extreme point which the author has reached in his bold and perilous journey. I do not, indeed, think that M. Loisy has any claim to great or striking originality. He is learned, indeed, and cultivated in a high degree. He is thoroughly acquainted with the work of German and English scholars, and he is master of a lucid and graceful style. If he were a Protestant I should be content to describe him simply as a Frenchman who was quite at home in critical theories, and had the art of putting them before the public much better than the learned men to whom their origin is due. Nothing, for example, can be more admirable than the résumé of Jülicher's treatise on our Lord's parables in M. Loisy's "Études Évangéliques." However, the real interest in M. Loisy's work springs from the fact that he is a Roman priest in the full exercise of his functions, that he is the foremost of French Roman Catholic writers on the Bible, that despite the loss of his professorial chair his influence over the younger clergy is apparently as strong as it ever was. Add to this the adventitious interest which has attached itself to the second of these new books—namely, "L'Évangile et l'Église." It has been condemned by Cardinal Richard, Archbishop of Paris, and withdrawn from circulation. Consequently it is very hard to procure. About a month ago a leading bookseller in London had already refused fourteen applications for a copy. The book is not to be found in the Bodleian, and it is only by the kindness of a friend that I have been at last enabled to read it. Of the two books with which we have to deal, the former—namely, "Les Études Évangéliques," is the less directly controversial. It discusses the nature and scope of the parables, and then expounds some of the central ideas in St. John's Gospel. The later work—namely, "L'Évangile et l'Église," is in form an attack on Harnack's "Wesen des Christenthums" ("Essence of Christianity"). I propose then, with the aid of each book, to explain M. Loisy's view of the New Testament and Church tradition. Next I shall give some account of his differences with Harnack. Lastly, I shall speak of his attempt to reconstruct, his defence, in other words, of Roman doctrine and worship.

Speaking generally, M. Loisy may be said to hold the critical opinions of the more destructive German school. On the whole he accepts the Synoptic tradition, though he is silent about miracles except the crowning miracle of the resurrection, while even of that he speaks in very doubtful tone.

> The empty tomb is only an indirect argument, nor is it decisive, since the disappearance of the body, the only fact proved, admits of other explanations than the resurrection. . . . The historian will reserve his adhesion, because for him the objective reality of the apparitions is not determined with sufficient precision.—("L'Évangile et l'Église," 74 seq.)

Again, he maintains that the Synoptics misunderstood the intention of the parables, which was to simplify truth, not to obscure it, and though their report of them is correct in the main, even that report is affected here and there by their mistaken idea that the parables were allegories. But more serious exception is taken against other utterances attributed to our Lord. For instance, the famous words on which Harnack builds with confidence, "No one knoweth the Son save the Father, neither doth anyone know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him," are, according to M. Loisy, of most doubtful authenticity, and that though they are attested both by St. Matthew and St. Luke. The whole passage, says M. Loisy, has a marked affinity in style with the last chapter of Ecclesiasticus, and this "makes it difficult to admit" that Christ uttered the words in question, so that the text, "at least in its present form," is probably "a product of early Christian tradition" (Év. et l'Égl., p. 46 seq.) Similarly Christ's memorable words, "The Son of Man came. . . . to give himself a ransom for many" (Mark x. 45), are attributed to Pauline influence, and M. Loisy also questions whether Christ really spoke of his blood as "the blood of the Covenant." (Mark xiv. 24.) We cannot wonder then that such a text as "Thou art Peter" is never quoted, opportune as it would have been for M. Loisy's attempted reconstruction. As for St. John's gospel it is left without a shred of historical authority, except, of course, when it merely repeats the data of the Synoptics.

> We have not [in St. John], properly speaking, gospel history, for the discourses of Christ [in St. John] would have been unintelligible to Galilaean peasants and Jewish scribes, or even to His [i.e., Christ's] own disciples: so also the description of facts receives a signification which stamps it as wholly ideal.*

The reader will observe that I am giving the opinions of M. Loisy, and am very far from agreement or even sympathy with them.

So much for M. Loisy's critical position. We turn next to the point of difference between Harnack and himself. It is concerned chiefly with the conception of Christ as Son of God. According to Harnack Christ was God's Son, because He alone knew the Father and could impart this knowledge to mankind. Therefore the gospel consists in the knowledge of God as Father. M. Loisy replies that Christ's consciousness of His position as the Son of God is all one with the consciousness that He was the Messiah, and he takes Matt. xi. 27 to mean that Christ knows the Father because He is the Son, not that He is Son because He knows the Father. The words convey the idea of an abiding relation. The Son is not Son because He knows the Father, any more than the Father is constituted Father by the fact that He knows the Son. Here, as it seems to me, M. Loisy's exegesis is perfect, and he rightly insists that since the gospel involves belief in the Kingdom of God it must also involve belief in Christ, through whom that kingdom was to be established. Still, even here the interest of M. Loisy's contention is almost evacuated by his doubt whether the words on which the controversy hinges were ever spoken by Christ at all.

We come last of all to the most astonishing part of M. Loisy's argument. Much is to be said against Harnack's attempt to revivify the simplicity of the early gospel. We cannot, if we would, return to the circumstances of the first disciples — their environment cannot become ours. New problems press upon us; nay, have pressed upon the Church ever since it began to make its way in the Roman Empire, problems which must be answered by every thoughtful man. If we accept Christ as Lord and Saviour (and what Christian can do less?) we must have some explicit reason for doing so. The mind as well as the heart must be subdued to the captivity of faith, and I do not believe that the theology of Harnack and the Ritschlian school, to which he belongs, can furnish any permanent resting-place for the soul of man. Simplicity is not in itself a recommendation; the life of the oyster is much more simple than that of man, but it is not preferable on that account. Christianity, far from being simple, is necessarily complicated in the utmost degree, just because it contains the fulness of truth, and determines the ever-changing relations of men to God and to each other in the continual progress of the race. The Spirit of Christ moves ever forward, and Christianity is the one true and absolute religion, because in a sense it is the most pliant and changeable of all systems of thought. The Church, then, was abundantly justified in formulating creeds, and it is a mark of strength, not of weakness, that it boldly adapted to its own use the metaphysics of Greece, and imitated the ordered government of the Roman Empire. "When he, the Spirit of truth, is come he shall guide you into all the truth." Nor is there any cogent and inevitable objection to an elaborate ritual. Costly vestments, elaborate music and architecture, the multiplication of sacramental rites have often been a help to worship in spirit and truth, whereas under the repulsive austerity of Puritan services the religious emotions have not unfrequently been starved to death. No fault can justly be imputed to the Church, because it did not limit itself to the precise words of the Lord or even to the language of the New Testament. Development is a mark of life, and inseparable from it. I am prepared to go further than this. I admit gladly and thankfully that the Holy Spirit has never abandoned any part of Christ's Church, and in particular that the doctrines and rites of the Roman Church have been, even when times were worst, true means of grace, true channels of Christ's eternal life to countless souls. So far I am in entire agreement with M. Loisy, though it is difficult to repress a smile when M. Loisy makes his reiterated appeal to an article by that "savant anglicain," the present Master of Balliol, which appeared some time ago in the New World. It is true, moreover, that our estimate of Christ is to be built up not only on what He did, not only even on what He was during the brief space of His visible presence upon earth, but also upon all that He has done for and through those who have walked in His steps and borne His image.

It is, however, quite another thing to maintain that the development of the Roman Church has always been normal and healthy, that it has never adopted hurtful elements from surrounding heathenism, or made false deductions from true premises. Let us take as an example the Papal power. Few educated men will deny that it did during a considerable time work mightily for good. Dr. Arnold applied to mediæval Popes the great words of the psalm, "I spake of thy testimonies before kings, and was not ashamed." Still, when we are asked to believe that the Papacy is of divine institution in such sense that those who are not in visible communion with the Pope are separated from the body of Christ, we may surely ask for proof of such a momentous claim. M. Loisy gives none, and he can give none, since the old proofs from Scripture and tradition have for him ceased to exist. We may regard these proofs as wholly inadequate—so I think they were—but the method of argument is in any case better than mere assumption. I, for one, could not accept the theology of the three creeds if I adopted, as I do not, the Radical criticism of M. Loisy.

To conclude, the development of Christianity cannot be identified offhand with the development of doctrine in the Roman Church. Why should the great Church of the East be excluded from providential guidance? Why should M. Loisy ignore the marvellous and beneficent energy of the Anglican Communion at the present day? He forgets, too, how little the Roman Church has done to guide souls in the perplexities due to recent advance in our knowledge of the Bible and of tradition. He himself derives his theological learning chiefly from those who are external to his own communion. Till the other day the Church of Rome presented a superficial appearance of unity. That unity, such as it was, was secured by the obstinacy with which the Roman Church closed its eyes against new light. Thanks to M. Loisy and others who are like-minded with him, the darkness and also the apparent unity seem to be passing away. It may be hard to see how the Church can escape from its disastrous claim to infallibility, from the shackles with which it has been bound by its own hand. But a thousand ways are present to God where man sees none, and a great future may even now await the historic Church of France.

HETERODOXY IN THE SIXTIES.*

Mr. H. W. Smith, whose name may be familiar to some of our readers as a compiler of fruitful passages from serious writers (vide the two volumes of "Modern Thoughts" issued by the publishers of the book under notice), has now discharged a pious debt to the memory of the religious teacher under whose guidance he became a heretic. The Rev. James Cranbrook, who died in 1869 at the age of fifty-one, was evidently a man well fitted to inspire enduring love, and to leave an indelible mark on the mind of candid youth. His history, as briefly told in an introduction to these lectures, is heroically simple. As a Congregational minister he grew upwards from the old traditions in quiet not easily distinguished from obscurity. During his ministry at Liscard, however, he found occasion to study history in particular as a preparation for lectures delivered at a ladies' college in Liverpool. In a critical hour he accepted an invitation to an Edinburgh pulpit. It was at the period when the cattle plague set the Churches praying and the sanitary authorities cleansing. The struggle between the old views of nature and the new, precipitated by the publication of Darwin's "Descent of Man," was in its first heat. Huxley and Tyndall were names of ill-omen in the churches. An intelligent preacher had to choose between life and evil (the evil of obloquy) on the one hand, and death and good (the good of ease and good repute) on the other.

Cranbrook, a gentle, modest man, neither physically nor mentally made (it would appear) for the part of an iconoclast, made his choice without hesitation. He fearlessly announced his utter disbelief that prayers would avert the rinderpest, and suggested a more rational course of procedure. The average orthodox mind was unprepared then for such cold simplicities; the Scottish orthodox mind was outraged by them. In two years after his coming to Edinburgh Mr. Cranbrook was forced to take up an independent attitude. He founded a new religious fellowship, something after the manner of Theodore Parker, and for a year or two longer continued his outspoken ministry. Then he fell victim to disease, and having published these lectures in 1868 as "a study of the men and circumstances that originated Christianity" he calmly awaited the end, and left his seed-corn to fructify where it might.

The lectures were worth reproduction, and may be perused with profit and interest by two classes of readers. The average orthodox—if we may refer to him again—will find strong meat here, and having read, marked, and inwardly digested what this brave speaker of forty years ago had to say on the origins of Christian literature and legend, he may discuss with himself how much longer he will postpone committing himself to rationalism in religion. The more critical and better-informed reader will, indeed, regret that important facts and considerations which have come forward in the course of a full generation's progress of Gospel study are inevitably missing from these pages. A certain crudeness in argument carries one back to those stern vigorous wars of the giants when the positive side was so very positive and the negative so uncompromisingly negative. As a brief, thoughtful, and—for its extent—masterly statement of the anti-mythological position, as it was held in the author's day, the book deserves to be called admirable. Whither the author's views carried him in religious philosophy, or whither his disciples have proceeded, is not a pertinent matter except in the degree that temperament is allowed to be an important factor in the weighing of evidence. The reverent affection that has prompted this re-issue can be well understood; even a stranger lays the book down with a feeling of tender sympathy and grateful recognition towards the true heart and brain that gave here of their best.

This anonymous work contains an onslaught upon theology, in the form of a criticism of Mr. Arthur Balfour's book on "The Foundations of Belief" (a second edition of which has recently been issued); and incidentally of his earlier book, "A Defence of Philosophic Doubt." It is written with vigour and, we presume, with conviction; but the author never for a moment allows himself to occupy the positions which he attacks—he more than once confesses that he cannot understand how any rational being can occupy them. This is not a hopeful position from which to attack a book or a system of belief. "The sickly dreams and mystic visions of theology," "Baseless and grotesque notions," "Exploded theological figments," "Vain and foolish dreams"—such phrases abound in the author's pages and stamp the character of his treatment. His are not the methods of an impartial searcher after truth. On many points we recognise the special pleading of the mere debater, as in the following:—"Is there a civilised man in existence who will dare to say that if the command 'Thou shalt not kill' was not given by God, and if, in fact, there is no God, it is right or permissible for any man, apart from the terrors of the civil law, to commit as many murders as he pleases?" (P. 42.) In a report of a debate in which this were said, we should certainly have to insert "Loud applause" at this point. But a moment's reflection is sufficient to show that it triumphantly evades the real question at issue, which is whether, on the so-called "naturalistic" hypothesis, the words "right" and "wrong" can retain any meaning, and whether (as Dr. Martineau would have said) all distinctions on the moral scale, of "higher" and "lower," are not necessarily destroyed and superseded by distinctions on the prudential scale.

It is true that a certain interest attaches to this volume because of the books which it attacks. It is necessary to glance at the main course of the argument in the "Defence of Philosophic Doubt" and the "Foundations of Belief" before we go further. In both these works there is a preliminary contention which is obviously true—i.e., that the vast majority of our beliefs—religious, ethical, social, and those habits of belief which we call "common sense," do not depend on the consciously reasoned assent of the individuals who entertain them, but are generated in the mind by custom, education, public opinion, and the contagious convictions of countrymen, family, party, or Church, and not least by the Zeitgeist or spirit of the age, producing a certain mental atmosphere or climate favourable to the life of certain beliefs, unfavourable or even fatal to the life of others. Mr. Balfour is concerned to show that there is a system of Causes for belief, and one in which deliberate reasoning plays a very small part. So far, we may all agree. In both works, again, the author's general aim is the same, to show that religious belief and scientific belief are at bottom on the same level as regards intellectual trustworthiness. But there are two lines of thought by which this aim may be attained. The "Defence of Philosophic Doubt" is almost entirely occupied with the one, and the "Foundations of Belief" is partly, but not consistently, occupied with the other.

(1) According to the first view, the aforesaid causes are altogether non-rational in character, because deliberate reasoning plays so small a part in them; and since the only "authority" for any established habit of belief is this non-rational force of custom and tradition, we are led at once to the conclusion that all beliefs are at bottom rationally groundless, but most of them are practically inevitable. This is the result which our author insists is the final outcome of Mr. Balfour's reasonings; "if all creeds, whether theological or scientific, are equally irrational, all may be equally accepted." (P. 210.)

(2) According to the other view, the current habits of belief are far from being non-rational, for while there has been little deliberate, conscious reasoning in their formation, they are the product of ages of experience interpreted and partly formed by the laws of our intelligence, as Kant proved; and further, the fundamental beliefs on which science rests are on the same intellectual level as those on which religion rests, because both alike are postulates, though resting on different sides of human nature. This view the present writer has tried to illustrate in "Leaders of Religious Thought," pp. 92-8. It would not commend itself to the author of the volume before us; but there is really little interest in inquiring what particular collection of epithets he would apply to it. Professor A. Seth Pringle-Pattison has shown, in an essay in his book on "Man's Place in the Cosmos," that something like this second view is the final outcome of the argument in "The Foundations of Belief."

If a critic wishes to have any right to claim a hearing he must have some consistent principle or ground on which his criticisms rest. If he fights a guerilla warfare, attacking now from one point of view, now from another and opposite one, he is unworthy of serious notice. To some extent this is what our author does. We give one instance, not the only one, and ask the reader crimine ab uno discere omnia. Mr. Balfour had said that it is hard to see why on the "naturalistic" hypothesis morality should be put above appetite, or reason above pleasure; all alike are products of natural selection acting through the struggle for existence. To this the author makes several preliminary replies, some of them very absurd, as it seems to us—e.g., "Gentle William Shakespeare and Palmer, the poisoner, both sprang from the English nation, but no subtle dialectician has yet come forward to maintain that both men are therefore equally deserving of love and veneration." (P. 46.) What Mr. Balfour meant was, of course, what Dr. Martineau meant when he said, speaking of the "evolution" of morality:—"I can understand how society, taking the individual in hand, can create a must for him, but not how it can create an ought; and as self-interest, by which it works, does not begin to be anything else by length of days, but only becomes a swifter thought and an easier habit of the same type, it is useless to borrow millenniums in order to turn it into duty." If morality is only a social convenience, then there is no ground for calling one action or passion "higher" than another. Our author attempts to come to close quarters with this argument as follows:—

Mr. Balfour tells us that, on the naturalistic hypothesis, courage and self-surrender, duty and heroism, cannot be noble and august, because they grow out of the same soil as selfishness, anger, and lust. We answer that they could not grow from any other soil at all. If there were no struggle for existence, no imperious bodily appetites, no cruel selfishness, there could be no sacrifice and no heroism, and the word "duty" would have no meaning. If earth were transformed into the fabled Christian heaven, and sorrow and tears were banished, and all human beings were freed from bodily wants and the selfishness which springs therefrom, what, in such a world, would be the meaning of the phrase, "the majesty of the moral law"? How, in such a world, where each person had all that he required, and where peace and happiness constantly reigned, could there be any room for the exercise of courage, heroism, and self-sacrifice? (P. 42.)

This reminds us almost verbally of Dr. Martineau's saying, that a world which no evil could invade would be a world which no character could inhabit. And yet (p. 155 ff.) the author argues that the Creator ought to have made man at once in this state—a state where none of the highest human qualities could exist! Every time the author refers to the problem of evil, his argument consists in expanding this idea that man (if the Creator were good) ought to have been created perfect in all respects, even "with a perfect sense-apparatus, so that no aspect of nature should be hidden from his view." (P. 89.) The author's notion of perfection appears to be a state of things like the present, except that everything disagreeable or painful is eliminated, which seems to us to be a mere contradiction in terms.

The author has, however, a fundamental position to which he consistently adheres: "No methods of investigation save those of science are admissible, because (sic) the experience of the race has proved beyond a doubt that knowledge can only be gained by observation, corrected and verified by experiment." (P. 34.) This is the meaning of "Rationalism," and on "Rationalism" the future of Civilisation depends. (P. 60.) Mr. Balfour had said, and was severely criticised in the columns of The Inquirer and elsewhere for saying, that the logical outcome of "Rationalism" is materialism; but this book seems to us to afford a complete proof of the soundness of that opinion. If the only avenues of knowledge are the physical senses and logical inferences therefrom, the result is to extinguish not only all the highest faiths of the world, but all the deepest and noblest human ties. The prevalence of this "physical superstition" is of course an important factor in modern life, and must be recognised and reckoned with, as the late R. H. Hutton often pointed out. (See, for instance, "Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought," p. 163-5.) It is certainly somewhat humorous that desperate efforts should be made in the name of Reason to promote a superstition like this. The only way out of the impasse is to understand, first, that Reality cannot be limited merely to what is capable of impressing itself on the bodily senses; and, secondly, that Reason cannot be limited to mere "observation and experiment" on what is given to it from without. The latter distinction is in effect made by Mr. Balfour, and our author, with extraordinary ineptitude, attributes it to him as a contradiction. "He (Balfour) holds that Reason is a comparatively unimportant faculty, and that in most respects it is greatly inferior to instinct; while, secondly, he holds out that any theory which does not recognise Reason as the ground of all existence is degrading and absurd." (P. 212.) The "comparatively unimportant faculty" is merely that of observation and experiment, and it is comparatively unimportant as a source of beliefs or as a possible critic of beliefs. "The suggestion that in some mysterious fashion, Reason is the ground of all existence, seems to us absurd." This is unfortunate for Plato, Aristotle, Spinoza, Leibnitz, Kant, Fichte, Hegel, to say nothing of an army of more recent thinkers; but the future will show whether they will all have to bow before the ipse dixit of the nineteenth century materialists or not.

S. H. Mellone.

THE MENACE OF MISERY.*

II.

With Mr. McKenzie's book the scene changes. Here, we are in Canning Town amongst the dock labourers; in the quarters also of the sweated industries and of the alien. The descriptions are of a totally different literary order from those of "The Abyss," and for the simple reason that the purpose of this work is to state facts in plain black and white. Mr. McKenzie was led to his investigations by certain confessions he elicited from members of the recent unemployed processions. Here is a sample:

"I was clerk at ——'s, in Fenchurch-street, for twenty years," said an elderly processionist. "They went bankrupt, and then I could get nothing. Who wants a man of fifty as clerk? So after I spent all I had hunting about, I had to come down to the docks and hang about the gates for a job. I've been at the St. Katherine's Docks three years. But work is very slack now, and even a man at fifty doesn't like being hungry." And his eyes ran with water from weakness as he spoke.

Such, Mr. McKenzie assures us, while allowing for the presence of "vicious" elements, is a fair sample of the composition of these processions. This conviction moved him to make as thorough an investigation of the recent slackness of work as possible, and the results of it, as summed up in this little book, are an eloquent testimony to the pains he has taken, as well as to the sad fact of unmerited distress. His inquiries began at the Board-schools in the dock neighbourhood. Piteous is it to read the evidence so gathered—of boys and girls, breakfastless, bare-foot, without underclothing. Tea and bread formed the staple food of most—when they could get it. One boy in particular, who had been champion short-distance swimmer at one of the baths, could scarcely stand from weakness. That these children should be incapable, in such a condition, of assimilating any of the teaching goes without saying. The more serious reflection is the far-reaching effect of such a condition on generations to come.

Happily, through the medium of the Daily Mail, Mr. McKenzie's investigation resulted in immediate relief to the amount of £2,000. But this, of course, contributes nothing towards the solution of the problem. The winter now passing has not been exceptionally severe, nor has trade been exceptionally bad. Still, the fact remains that work has been exceptionally slack. The most valuable result of the evidence accumulated is that it is scarcity of work and not loafing that accounts for the miserable condition of the parents of these children. At every turn Mr. McKenzie's first impression of the processionist people, above stated, was confirmed.

The dock-gate rush is a terrible sight to anyone with a heart to feel. These men are not loafers. They are waiting and struggling, not for charitable doles, but for the privilege to labour. Their numbers have swollen enormously this winter, a sure sign of general want. Picturesque writers have described them as "ruined lawyers, unfrocked clergymen, &c." Such a description is absurd. There are men who have come down, but they are mainly clerks without work or mechanics who have lost their skill. The great mass, however, are not men who have fallen, but men who have never had the chance to rise.

Not content with interviewing the men individually and collecting evidence at the schools, the author went from house to house and from street to street, and the chapter "An East End Street" contains a detailed account of families occupying seventy houses. We earnestly commend the perusal of that chapter to our readers.

Discussing the causes of this lack of employment, the author points out as one of the chief factors the decline of trade in the Port of London, a state of affairs "definitely caused by legislative stupidity."

> The shipping entering the port to discharge from foreign ports during December, 1901, came to 566,000 tons; in December, 1902, it was only 518,000 tons; in January, 1902, 516,000; in January, 1903, only 466,000 tons. These figures mean much more than shortage at the docks. The imports are largely the barometer of trade. . . . Fewer men are employed in the warehouses, and fewer in a hundred other ways.

He goes so far as to say that "reform of the Port of London lies at the base of the cure of London's poverty."

Apart from the obvious remedies for specific causes, what general remedies are proposed? We have to recognise three classes of unemployed (in London), (1) paupers—whose numbers are steadily increasing. These are the figures:—

In 1900	68,433	indoor paupers.

The serious import of these figures is, not merely growing poverty, but a decline in the old aversion to parish aid. The latter means not only a steady rise in the rates, but—what we feel to be a far worse outlook for the nation—a loss of heart and decline of independence. (2) An increasing permanent semi-dependent class. (3) A large number of honest, moderately-capable and willing-to-work unemployed.

These three classes will have to be dealt with differently. The purely pauper class is outside Mr. McKenzie's present scope, and yet it is obviously the natural outcome of the other two classes, and will increase or diminish directly as they vary. It is the semi-dependent people who, as the author remarks, present the crux of the difficulty. Charity their case demands, yet charity will not solve the problem they present, and in certain forms will only increase their numbers. Yet again, should relief agencies stay their hand, many must, in a few weeks, die from starvation, many others go to the workhouses. The cost to the public would in that case be greater, to say nothing of the terrible inhumanity of the situation.

But if the condition of the semi-dependents is not due, or not due altogether, to their own fault, to what is it largely due? To their upbringing, their casual labour, and their intermittent pay. We require, in order to check these evils, a far more rational system of education—especially among the girls. The science of "home-making" is practically untaught, and this is the very thing the future wives and mothers of the community ought to be taught, since they can learn it nowhere but at school. Again, an improvement in the general labour market is at least a partial remedy for casual employment and intermittent pay. We are not so entirely at one with Mr. McKenzie in his advocacy of emigration, even to the colonies. Where we do find ourselves in agreement is in his proposal for the re-creation of the small holder in our own deserted country districts. We say this mindful of the result of Mr. Haggard's rural investigations:—

> Wherever small holdings exist in England there is comparative prosperity, great love of the soil, and a desire to cultivate it, an increasing as compared with a diminishing population . . . and a considerable addition to the demand for labour.

Thus, while little can be done for the present generation of semi-dependents—except in the way of judicious relief, much can be done, and ought to be set about without delay, in the way of education, and making the country attractive for the numbers that are being born into this difficult, but by no means hopeless, class. Cannot some at least of the many influences at present in touch with these semi-dependent and intermittent-labour classes urge on them the advantages of the cleaner, wholesomer, truly-richer life of the country? Are there not more persons of the same spirit as Major Poore and Sir Robert Edgcumbe to create small holdings and place facilities in the way of the people? We trust so; but meanwhile what is needed is a simplification of life all round. It is of no use recommending a simple life to the poor, trying to wean them away from the glare and glitter and chance prospects of the towns which exercise such a woful fascination upon them, while the successful and influential are leading lives which in their artificiality emphasise all that is such a fatal infatuation with the poor. Let those who are "rich in this world's goods" be content, for the sake of the nation, to live more truly and simply; let them modify their present revolting extravagance and live a little nearer to the lilies of the field. Not until they do shall we be able to urge, and hope to find, a more reasonable and human state of things among the masses.

The true menace of misery is not that the state of things these books describe presages revolution, but that it constitutes a cancer spreading slowly but surely through tens of thousands of hopeless, heartless lives. No nation can possibly maintain unimpaired its vitality, its "efficiency" with such a gangrene thriving upon its best and strongest. "We are saved by hope," but hope, in Camberwell, Bermondsey, Canning Town, Shoreditch, Stepney, Hoxton, Pentonville, and any other of those immense dark suburbs that encircle the light and splendour of the Imperial city, there is none.

The new number of the Hibbert Journal does not contain any article of exceptional brilliance, such as that by Professor Henry Jones in last quarter's issue, but it maintains a high level of interest in the several subjects dealt with.

Professor Schmiedel contributes his promised article on "Did Paul write Romans?" in criticism of Professor W. B. Smith, and next quarter Dr. Van Manen is to carry on this critical game. Professor B. W. Bacon, of Yale, writes on "Recent Aspects of the Johannine Problem," dealing in this first article with the "External Evidence," and showing how much progress has been made in the discussion since Professors Schürer and Sanday presented their opposing views in the Contemporary Review of 1891. The external evidence, Professor Bacon maintains, "both in the matter of silence and utterance, seems at least as capable of interpretation against as for the Johannine authorship." Of kindred interest is the Rev. James Moffatt's full review of Harnack's "Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten."

The article of chief importance in this number is that by Professor A. Seth Pringle-Pattison on "Martineau's Philosophy." It sets in a clear light the historical position of Martineau's work in the progress of English thought, and further elaborates that sympathetic criticism of his philosophy, which Professor Upton has included in his masterly study of the subject in the "Life." Of that study Professor Pringle-Pattison speaks in warm commendation: "Professor Upton not only furnishes all the material for a critical estimate of Martineau's place in English thought, but himself touches with discriminating hand the weak no less than the strong points in his master's system." Professor Pringle-Pattison's own attitude towards Martineau's teaching may be seen from the following passage:—

> The services of Martineau to spiritual philosophy in England during the nineteenth century cannot easily, I think, be overestimated. These services seem to me, however, to be to a large extent independent of the specific form which the fundamental doctrines of such a philosophy assume in his own theory. His peculiar theory of conscience has grave defects, and I question whether anyone maintains it at the present day. But his splendid insistence on the moral life and its implications, as furnishing the key to human existence and man's relation to the divine—the massive resistance which he offered to every attempt to explain ethical experience by other than ethical categories, whether baldly physical, or of a metaphysical kind that are but physical in disguise—these are in the spirit of Butler and of Kant, and greatly helped to raise English thought from its inherited hedonism and necessarianism. Even should his doctrine of Freedom itself be found to require modification, it was ethically true as against the necessarianism from which it emancipated Martineau himself, and all who have listened to his searching and persuasive pleading. So, again, his own doctrine of Cause may be open to serious philosophical criticism, but his distinction between ordered sequence and real agency and his demonstration of the impossibility of reducing the latter to the former, enabled him to dissect the sophisms which are apt to gather round the term "law." His exposure of the fundamental absurdity of a mindless universe, his timely reminder of the true scope and meaning of evolution, and his impassioned vindication of moral right as "no local essence," but allegiance "due to one eternal Perfection which penetrates the moral structure of all worlds," made his addresses on "Modern Materialism" more effective than any other utterances in stemming the dangerous tide of turbid materialistic speculation to which the Darwinian doctrine at first gave rise. The clearness and beauty of Martineau's style, the rhetorical force of his pleading, the ethical passion and spiritual dignity of the man, combined to make him an ideal champion of the spiritual view of the world in a time of transition and intellectual insecurity. For myself, I cannot but think that it is on such imperishable services to the common cause of idealism, rather than on the peculiar features which differentiate his own treatment from other systems, that Martineau's place in the history of English thought will ultimately depend. (P. 444.)

The whole of this valuable article will be carefully read and considered by students of Martineau's philosophy; but we trust that we may be forgiven if we make one more quotation from its concluding paragraph:—

The deepest expression of his thought is really to be found in his religious writings, and in those passages of his philosophical books which are written under the same inspiration. He was of the lineage of the prophets and the saints rather than that of the great speculative thinkers. Yet it is easy to undervalue his specifically philosophical work, and I should much regret if the criticisms into which I have been led tended to encourage such a view. As a thinker his defects were to a large extent the defects of his qualities. His insistence on the supreme place of the ethical life was like a trumpet-call to rally men from a naturalistic absorption in the world of things and events that happen. His jealous reservation of the personal sphere in man, even from the influx of the Divine, however it may have obscured his own speculative outlook, was a wholesome corrective of panlogistic and purely pantheistic tendencies within the Hegelian school. In a more general reference his exposure of the futility of "ideals" which are not faiths in "the Everlasting Real," his noble confidence in Reason, and his unclouded assurance of the immortal destiny of the spirit, made him a beacon of hope to multitudes in a troubled century. (P. 464.)

Among the remaining articles is another from Yale, by Professor G. B. Stevens, with an appreciative account of "Auguste Sabatier and the Paris School of Theology." Professor Mahaffy writes on "The Drifting of Dogma" with extremely interesting reminiscences of the religious society of Dublin fifty years ago, pointing out how gradually the prevailing attitude has changed towards the chief evangelical doctrines in the Church. Professor Rhys Davids, from his rich stores of knowledge, gives an account of "Buddhism as a Living Force," and Dr. Josiah Oldfield, who, as a friendly vegetarian, had exceptional opportunities while in India of gaining native confidence, writes frankly on the "Failure of Missions in India." Study of that article should be good for European conceit.

Among the "Discussions" there is a brief but sufficient response from Mr. Armstrong in reply to Mr. Cohen's note on "Catastrophes and Moral Order." At the end of this number, in place of the synopsis of articles in "Recent Theological and Philosophical Periodicals," there is a valuable classified "Bibliography of Recent Books and Articles," the method of which does not too easily explain itself.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Turning of the Cloud.

Pilgrim had travelled far and far through Winterland. It was a grey, silent country. The trees were bare, the grass was dull with frost-bite, the birds were few and voiceless. Only here and there a brave thrush rang out its determined song, and here and there a cheery robin greeted the wayfarer from a lower perch. On the black hills the snow lay like the silvery hair on an old man's head. It was a cold and fearsome land, with little sunshine and long nights.

By-and-by the road followed a winding valley and crept beneath a sheltering copse. A solitary daisy twinkled like a tiny star in a meadow. At length a pale primrose peeped round from beside a mossy hazel stump, a celandine shone by the roadside, a party of blue-tits gambolled in the dry fallen beech leaves and then shot from bough to bough keenly examining the still unopened buds for microscopic morsels. And now the whitethorn in the hedge put on its emeralds; while the blackthorn broke its pearly buds into clusters of least little wide-awake white roses, and by these signs Pilgrim knew that he was leaving Winterland behind. Right gaily the sun came out as he crossed the frontier into Springland.

One day in the early forenoon (for he had risen with the sun) he reached the dwelling of Love and Hope high up among the hills; not the great cold mountains of Winterland, but the Sunny Hills. Love and Hope are sisters. They are skilful and beautiful and strong. Their hands are full of kindness to those who travel by the Long Road. They bade Pilgrim stay and rest and be refreshed while they continued busy at their craft. They seemed to be at work making up or altering a great quantity of web-like material which they said they had gathered on the sides of the hills next to Winterland. Pilgrim noticed that this material was dark and heavy as they brought it in, but after their handling—Love taking it up and fingering it and presently passing it on to Hope—it became bright and shining and so light that it could hardly be kept folded on the ground. Pilgrim stood watching this industry in no little astonishment, and after, a while asked the sisters to explain to him the nature and purpose of their art.

"We are turning clouds," they said. "Can we turn one for you?"

And even so it was, for the soft dark stuff which they had brought down from the crags and the travellers' paths was cloud, and in it many who came from Winterland lost their way and were wont to sit by the roadside weeping and weary. But when Love and Hope had turned the clouds so that they shone with their silver lining and floated lightly away as they were released in the fresh sunny breeze, those who had been benighted and wearied with sad and aimless wanderings looked up joyously and, seeing their way before them, rejoiced exceedingly and sang pleasant songs of wayfaring.

Then Pilgrim heard what at first he thought was the tinkle of a mountain sheep-bell, but soon he understood that it was the bells of a village church which lay at a distance below on the fair plain. "What are the bells ringing for this morning?" he asked. "It is Easter Day," Hope replied. "This is the gladdest of days, for men put away sadness on this day, as we have finished the turning of the Great Cloud."

"What great cloud?" inquired Pilgrim.

"The Cloud of the Fear of Death," they said. "We have had to work very hard at this, but it is done now;" and with that they lifted it up fold after fold. It seemed large enough to cover a vast multitude; but as these two raised it—no longer heavy and gloomy, but buoyant and glistening and pierced with sunbeams—the wind caught it and it sailed away over the hillsides and the meadows, over the farms and over the clustering homes of the village whose merry bells rang on; and all who saw it looked up with great comfort, for it was no longer the dark cloud of the Fear of Death, but the bright cloud of the Hope of Life.

And Pilgrim looked Westward, and lo, it was as though the flowers had come forth from the earth at the sound of the Easter bells, and a thousand daffodils tossed their heads and the violets flung their scent on the wind and the birds flocked back from foreign lands. The swallows came back to their chimneys and eaves, the lambs bleated and the cuckoo called, and the laughter and praise of children and men went up with the larks to heaven, for Easter had come and dark fear had become shining hope. And this is the song they sang:—

An Easter Carol.

Spring bursts to-day,
For Christ is risen and all the Earth's at play.

Flash forth, thou Sun,
The rain is over and gone, its work is done.

Winter is Past,
Sweet Spring is come at last, is come at last.

Bud, Fig and Vine,
Bud, Olive, fat with fruit and oil and wine.

Break forth this morn
In roses, thou but yesterday a Thorn.

Uplift thy head,
O pure white Lily, through the Winter dead.

Beside your dams
Leap and rejoice, you merry-making Lambs.

All Herds and Flocks
Rejoice, all Beasts of thickets and of rocks.

Sing, Creatures, sing,
Angels and Men and Birds and everything.

All notes of Doves
Fill all our world: this is the time of loves.*

LIFE THAT KNOWS NO DEATH.

IN the midst of the rejoicing of the Easter festival, renewed every year in the fresh glory of the spring-time, we are not forgetful of the sacred lesson of the Cross and of the shadows through which JESUS entered into the fulness of life.

So long as there are those who hunger after righteousness, who feel the power of his spirit, who are strengthened by their personal allegiance to him, so long will the self-sacrifice of JESUS be remembered with undying gratitude and reverence, and the pathetic story of his death will stir in his disciples' hearts the deepest thoughts of the divine meaning of faithful suffering, the revealing of the power and righteousness of GOD in duty, the light of heaven breaking through the darkness, and the joy of the triumphant spirit.

"All things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you." Even in the silence of his death he speaks to us of the unchanging love of GOD. For what does it mean, this life so beautiful and gracious, with such joy in things pure and true and gentle, speaking with such deep inward knowledge of the FATHER in heaven, but then so soon clouded and cut off by a cruel death? What does it mean to those who enter into the secret of his life? What but a testimony of the spirit, a revealing of the truth of GOD, in the passionate assurance that the life is not so destroyed, that love and truth and righteousness are not thus overthrown! Out of the very darkness and silence comes to us the calm word of faith: "The Christ is risen, and is triumphant over death."

So the Cross becomes to us a sacred emblem of life. It means truth and unselfishness and love stronger than death. It casts upon our life not the shadow of despair, but the light of undying hope and a victorious confidence. In this season of thanksgiving we remember him who laid down his life for his friends. We are permitted to enter into that inner circle, and to know something of the depth of love and gratitude and loyalty, which filled those first disciples' hearts. They were made new men, and our prayer is, that we may be of the same spirit. In that fellowship there is still bread of life to be had by those who find the way of faithfulness in asking, with faces turned towards the light. The weary and heavy laden, taking his yoke upon them, still find rest to their souls. The lonely and the downcast find the comfort of a hidden sympathy. The strong and joyful find a friend, who teaches them the secret of divine helpfulness and more perfect joy.

In the silence of this commemoration other sacred memories come back to us, of early vows, of the first awakening of faith and love, the first surrender of a grateful discipleship. There come memories of those who have spoken for us words of power and divine revealing, the touch of whose sympathy was a quickening of new life, our closest friends, who still are ours in undying fellowship of love and trust. And we must ask, Are we true to them? Have we followed our Master in his lowliness of spirit, in the pure faith, the self-forgetting service of his life? Have we been worthy of what we have received in those others, of this holy communion which is ours, with the faithful of every generation, and above all with those who in the nearest sense are our own, in the great Household of GOD?

Easter is the time to be born again into newness of life.

"THIS DO."

No mystic rite, no hand of priest,
  No form antique is here,
Yet loyally I keep the feast—
  A sacrament sincere;
The daily bread with joy I break
  Which thou didst bless for me,
My simple cup I simply take
  In memory of thee.

And here I pledge my heart again,
  A heart oft pledged before,
To follow thee thro' bliss or pain,
  My Leader, evermore;
And wheresoe'er those blessèd feet
  Have marked the path for me,
Of heavenly food my soul shall eat
  In memory of thee.

To fill with love and tender grace
  The labours of the day,
And from the hard world's frowning face
  To lift the cloud away,
To fight the false, to help the true,
  Whate'er may hap to me,—
This will I do, or try to do,
  In memory of thee.

And thus to share my Master's task
  Shall be my bread and wine,
Nor can I hope, nor will I ask
  A banquet more divine;
And all who love thee as their Lord
  Shall keep this feast with me,
And gather round the sacred board
  In memory of thee.

Easter, 1903. W. G. TARRANT.

LIFE RENEWED.

THE season every year brings round its new delight. The stirring of new life touches us with the thrill of hope, even where there are the shadows of grief, and with a great joy in the natural loveliness of the earth.

We remember the dismay of sorrow, and the true poet's cry to Spring, to delay no more:—

Can trouble live with April days,
Or sadness in the summer moons?

Bring orchis, bring the foxglove spire,
  The little speedwell's darling blue,
  Deep tulips dash'd with fiery dew,
Laburnums, dropping-wells of fire.

O thou, new year, delaying long,
  Delayest the sorrow in my blood,
  That longs to burst a frozen bud
And flood a fresher throat with song.

TENNYSON learnt to sound the fuller deeper note of triumphant life, and our English spring is the lovelier for his song. In the faith that Love is for ever "Lord and King," and therefore that "all is well," he can teach us the fuller measure of delight. With the returning season we see his new birth of hope:—

  and in my breast
  Spring wakens too; and my regret
  Becomes an April violet,
And buds and blossoms like the rest.

His face is now turned not backward towards the shadows; he looks up and faces the light of a new day.

Is it, then, regret for buried time
  That keenlier in sweet April wakes,
  And meets the year, and gives and takes
The colours of the crescent prime?

Not all: the songs, the stirring air,
  The life re-orient out of dust,
  Cry thro' the sense to hearten trust
In that which made the world so fair.

Not all regret: the face will shine
  Upon me, while I muse alone;
  And that dear voice, I once have known,
Still speak to me of me and mine.

Yet less of sorrow lives in me
  For days of happy commune dead;
  Less yearning for the friendship fled,
Than some strong bond which is to be.

So he for his friend; and his song has become a message of new hope, which blends with all the deeper melody of this time. For everyone there is the same great prophecy.

Love is and was my King and Lord,
  And will be, tho' as yet I keep Within his court on earth, and sleep
Encompass'd by his faithful guard.

And here at times a sentinel
  Who moves about from place to place,
  And whispers to the worlds of space,
In the deep night, that all is well.

It is not towards death, but towards life, richer and more perfect life, that we are being led. And in that fuller life are the stronger bonds of friendship, the surprises of a great revealing, in those "whom we have loved long since, and lost awhile," a love beyond anything of which we now can even dream. Into the great Unknown we carry with us that which it is of the greatest consequence for us to know, knowledge of the "Living Will" that shall endure, and of those others, in whose companionship is the abiding joy of our life.

My love involves the love before;
My love is vaster passion now;
Tho' mix'd with God and Nature thou,
I seem to love thee more and more.

Far off thou art, but ever nigh;
I have thee still, and I rejoice;
I prosper, circled with thy voice;
I shall not lose thee tho' I die.

THE COMING OF SPRING.

Whatever happens, spring returns. Summer, in our climate—against which the charge of monotony or "business-like habits" has never been made—summer may elude us, or grant but fewest days worthy of that great name. Winter may pass almost forgetful of frost and snow. But spring, like autumn, is sure. In March and April the leaf unfolds, the flower opens as surely as in October the leaf will fall and the flower fade, though June afford no days of full midsummer radiance and cloudless skies of blue. Like the Church's Easter, spring may be a somewhat "moveable feast"; but early or late, the feast will be there, and the table spread with a lavish hand.

Whatever happens, spring returns—after the sternest and after the mildest winter; near to the crowded city and away among mountain solitudes and in lonely dells and by far-off shores; alike in time of peace and time of war, or when some baneful pestilence is stealing, dark and silent, about the world; however men are behaving themselves, and whatever political factions are in the ascendant, nature's strong life awakens, and spring comes surely on. The meadows change to green and gold; the trees turn reddish brown or purple and then break into clear bright green. Birds come back to build and sing, and bees are aware of sunshine and sally forth, humming to find sweet things among the petals. Ever the resurrection and renewal, the fresh activity of old laws, the reviving of ancient life, the surprise of new forms—of strange and yet familiar signs and glances on the "world's unwithered countenance."

Poems of the Spring.

Once, on a spring morning, an English poet was asked by a child to write some verses for him in an album. It was when the last great European war was raging, between Germany and France. "How can I write verses," he replied, "at such a time as this?"

"Speak low, speak little: who may sing
While yonder cannon-thunders boom?
Watch, shuddering, what each day may bring,
Nor pipe amid the crack of doom."

Then his thoughts turn to Nature and the joy of her fresh wakening life, and music wakes in his own heart.

"And yet the pines sing overhead,
The robins by the alder pool;
The bees about the garden bed,
The children dancing home from school.

And ever at the loom of birth
The mighty mother weaves and sings;
She weaves—fresh robes for mangled earth;
She sings—fresh hopes for desperate things."

There spake the healthy, hopeful soul—the mind in tune and in touch with those great energies of life that survive all change, that triumph over all decay and gloom and dearth and death.

And it must be well to rejoice and recover oneself thus in the strong exultant life of the great world. Whether the pulse of our own life beat strong or low; whether it is youth or age with us; whether man is wise or wicked, kind or cruel—it is well to be glad with Nature and with God, to rejoice that there there is no death and no disaster and no despair. And there are, in the abundant literature of England, some poems of springtime which should always be read when the crocus blooms, and the celandine glimmers in the hedgerows, and the daffodil breaks in gold from its sheath of green: Blake's "Songs of Innocence"; and Shelley's lines in "Prince Athanase"—"'Twas at the season when the earth upsprings from slumber"; and Browning's "O to be in England now that April's there"; and Tennyson's "Once more the Heavenly Power makes all things new"; and many more.

Wordsworth Above All.

But it is Wordsworth who can sing for us best the season's joy and cheer, by reason of the absolute sincerity and simplicity and spontaneous freshness of his utterance; and when we want to hear the voice of Nature's own child, with his ear close to the great mother's heart, we go to him. It may seem the merest trifling of commonplace to write, prosaically, "whatever happens, spring returns." "Of course it does," one answers; "what need to say it?" But when, reading again that wonderful 12th book of the Prelude, we come upon this:—

The morning shines,
Nor heedeth Man's perverseness; Spring returns,—
I saw the Spring return, and could rejoice
In common with the children of her love—

we no longer say, "Of course," or think the words not worth the saying. We feel the stir and stress of inspiration; we are made aware of something in the heart of man beating in conscious fellowship with the great life of things.

"Lines Written in Early Spring."

But there is one short and simple lyric of Wordsworth's which, not to read or murmur to oneself more than once, at this season of the year, would be like missing some part of the spring itself. Its title is, "Lines Written in Early Spring"; its meaning, that the soul of man and the soul of Nature are one, when both are aglow with the sweet wise joy of healthful life. There are lines in it at which the severe person or the cynic or the philistine, should he chance to waste some moment of his precious time in reading them, would smile, possibly sneer, or even sniff. "This will never do," he might say, recalling a famous criticism of a hundred years ago. "This is not poetry; it is twaddle, and very childish twaddle, too." Yet in truth those six little verses are the spontaneous outflow of a lover's heart, fresh and simple as the willow wren's melody, yet charged with a man's deep feeling—absolutely sincere, unpremeditated, free.

The poem was written when Wordsworth was twenty-eight years old. Here is what he said of the scene and the occasion of its composition, as it revived in his memory some fifty years after:—"Actually composed while I was sitting by the side of the brook that runs down from the comb in which stands the village of Alford, through the grounds of Alfoxden. It was a chosen resort of mine. The brook fell down a sloping rock, so as to make a waterfall considerable for that county. Across the pool below had fallen a tree, from which rose, perpendicularly, boughs in search of the light intercepted by the deep shade above. The boughs bore leaves of green that for want of sunshine had faded into almost lily-white, and from the underside of this natural sylvan bridge depended long and beautiful tresses of ivy, which waved gently in the breeze that might, poetically speaking, be called the breath of the waterfall. The motion varied, of course, in proportion to the power of water in the brook. When, with dear friends, I revisited the spot, after an interval of more than forty years, this interesting feature of the scene was gone."

Well, it was there, on a day in early spring, with the birds singing around, and the flowers silently blooming, and the "breath of the waterfall"—the motion in the air caused by the rush of the little stream—waving the long tresses of ivy that hung down from the tree towards the pool below,—it was there, he says,

I heard a thousand blended notes,
While in a grove I sate reclined,
In that sweet mood when pleasant thoughts
Bring sad thoughts to the mind.

To her fair works did Nature link
The human soul that through me ran;
And much it grieved my heart to think
What man has made of man.

Remember it is early spring. From the old earth, "the ever-unforsaken earth," amid forms of solid rock and fertile, rain-washed soil, young life is springing, fresh and gay; the tender green of leaves just opened, the brightness of the year's first flowers, the quick, glad movement of small birds foraging for food or busy about nests, and the ceaseless flow of clear, sweet water down the channel of the brook—these, in their manifold and varied forms, are there, joyous with the strong new life of nature. The poet is alone in the little valley, his heart all open and responsive to the life and movement of the place. And as he watches, and hears, and feels, song breaks from him, simple and natural as that from the birds whose home is there. How perfect is the melody, how rich and full the haunting sweetness of the line,

"I heard a thousand blended notes"!

All the music of that small, secluded valley seems to gather itself into those six words—the voices of birds, the hum of insects, the rustle of small earth-creatures among the dead leaves, the whisper of the breeze in the branches above, and the ever-changing sound of the flowing water.

The Stress of Human Conflict.

But the man who is there, hearing, seeing, rejoicing, is one who has been, of late, among far different scenes. He has known the tumult and the terror of human strife—not long before he was sharing in the struggle for liberty, and the wild confusion and turmoil of revolution. He had been travelling in France, and for several months was in Paris when the fierce contention of parties was approaching its dread, disastrous climax. He had seen "what man could make of man." His heart, which now yielded to the gentle influence of Nature, had felt the storm of human passion, and entered by strong sympathy into the hopes and fears and struggles of a people roused by oppression into stern and strenuous revolt. Since his return to England, that city had passed through its "Reign of Terror," and the dream of happiness and brotherhood seemed to have vanished in bloodshed and wild disorder.

Wordsworth could not forget these things; the scene of peace and joy that was around him, and the "sweet mood" which possessed his mind, could not but mingle "sad" with "pleasant" thoughts therein. "The still, sad music of humanity" made itself heard even in that bright place — "not harsh, nor grating, but with ample power to chasten and subdue." He was at one with Nature, but he was also at one with man; and this makes the deep note of quiet sorrow, which comes into his song, as natural and true as the happier one with which it blends. Imagination, which was Wordsworth's great gift, rendered this inevitable just then.

But Loveliness and Joy are There.

But, as he "watches and receives," the joyous note prevails again. He looks on the varied forms of fresh, sweet life and feels their happiness, and sings of it as if it were his own.

Through primrose-tufts in that green bower
The periwinkle trailed its wreaths;
And 'tis my faith that every flower
Enjoys the air it breathes.

The birds around me hopped and played;
Their thoughts I cannot measure:
But the least motion which they made,
It seemed a thrill of pleasure.

The budding twigs spread out their fan
To catch the breezy air;
And I must think, do all I can,
That there was pleasure there.

The Poet's Faith.

I know not if Wordsworth was the first to make the bold and startling claim that even a flower is not a stranger to happiness. But he was the first to utter his faith in words which, once heard, it were hardly possible to forget. And as one looks on these bright creatures of the earth, blooming in their own wild freedom, breathing the air and glowing in the sunshine of spring, those two glad lines recur to the memory, and make the heart beat quicker in the fellowship of joy which lowly living things may know,—

'Tis my faith that every flower
Enjoys the air it breathes.

It is a beautiful creed. It is well to hold it if we can. And perhaps it needs only a little more imaginative sympathy, a little more observing love, a closer interest in living things, and a more "wise passiveness" of receptive thought, to make this faith in widespread joy our own. We think, in these spring days, of the resurrection of Nature, of the myriads of creatures coming to life in woodlands, fields and valleys on every side; to think also of their happiness, and to rejoice with them, might be almost like a resurrection to ourselves. Our own sorrows, the sorrows of humanity, would be lightened as we thought of that wave of joy now sweeping over the earth, thrilling the birds into song and the flowers into beauty. The heart would grow larger and the mind more expansive and full through sympathy with God's humbler children, and some glow of Nature's own reviving healthfulness might enter and gain possession of body and of soul alike.

The Love that Conquers.

The human sadness will remain. It does with Wordsworth. He cannot dismiss, even in "that green bower" and amid all the "pleasure" that is there, the wrongs of his own world of humanity. And his poem ends with the recurrence of its plaintive note,—

If this belief from Heaven be sent,
If such be Nature's holy plan,
Have I not reason to lament
What man has made of man.

But the sorrow, like the joy, is that of love. No personal, selfish grief is there. "What man has made of man"! Ah! but he had learned, and was yet more to learn, and was to make it the burden of his greater song, that in a return to the simpler pleasures of life, in ceasing from the fierce strivings of worldliness, and by a closer, deeper love of Nature and humanity, we may find the very joys of "Paradise" to be "a simple produce of the common day." Love, which reads happiness in the flower's sweet life, shall yet create happiness for the restless and impassioned heart of man.

LIFE'S RESURRECTIONS.

In our normal life here on earth we have experienced a series of genuine resurrections. Our semi-conscious infancy passed away, and we arose from the dead as a thinking speaking child. Then our fully conscious childhood with dawning intelligence (not merely consciousness) passed away. We rose from the dead as a youth with intelligence and a semi-dormant moral sense. Youth passed away and we arose from that dead state to a manhood with awakening judgment and clearer moral sense: we observed an absolutely unerring connection between cause and effect in nature; we began to grow convinced that the same held true in moral relations. We noticed a ripening of all faculties and a clearer grasp of the moral meaning of life. Then dawned a new light, the spiritual insight, and this seems the golden link that in some way is bound to another golden link in what we call "the other world," by which we merely mean that the fitting condition for knowing the next higher state, the better resurrection is as yet below the horizon, it has not dawned. It is most significant how old men seem conscious of the possession of greater mental and spiritual grasp, yet have no instruments, no tools equal to their need: their senses grow feebler, their memory fails, yet all the time they are conscious of spiritual power, greater outlook, deeper insight. Nay, to express the new series of spiritual resurrections men have come to clearly understand the language of him who said "that men may rise on stepping-stones of their dead selves to higher things," both mental and spiritual. For surely there is no mature man or woman who does not value his or her present development of life, of mind and heart and soul as something much to be preferred to anything experienced at any time in the past. One seems to comprehend things more readily, one seems to have a harvest of perseverance and patience, a larger view, and one sees no limit to this side of our nature progressing, so that when we shuffle off this mortal coil, this muddy vesture of decay, we shall feel like one awaking with a new-found sense of health, in which life will be more intensely worth living, and there seems no single reason to suppose that the series of resurrections will cease then, but continue infinitely. Think of the vast change, mental and spiritual, between the state of an infant and a normally-developing man. We have passed out of one resurrection into another, and each better than the last. A child could have had no inkling or dream of the mental and spiritual heritage it was coming into. So it will seem to us hereafter. We may surmise that an ever-progressive series of resurrections will take place, but can form no dream of the nature of the heritage that is to be ours. All we ask is that we shall come to life as usual, content to understand what has happened after it has happened; that life shall always be itself, guarding its sacred prerogative of being capable of reviving, and that mind shall periodically unfold its inner powers and capacities according to the needs and circumstances of our advancing life.

This aspect of resurrection has always had the more acute interest for mankind; they want to be assured that life and consciousness will never be extinct. It is curious, and rather indicates a lower than a higher plane of spiritual life, that people want what they call a scientific or revealed guarantee of immortality, or of resurrection. The clear, spiritual indication, or intimation, at the very seat of life does not seem sufficiently strong. People try, for example, to account for the great religious revival amongst Christ's first disciples as owing to a sense of assured immortality by the reappearance of Christ in the risen body, instead of seeing in the stories of the Resurrection a reflection of their own resurrection to a higher plane of spiritual thought and life. How, exactly, this their resurrection took place is not, of course, matter for exact determination, any more than you can determine the exact moment or describe the exact conditions when intelligence first dawns in an infant's mind, or judgment dawns in a man's mind, or the spiritual faculty dawns in the same mind, and which appears to a man startling, like the awaking to a new life. All the dark spiritual clouds that veil the sun about to rise gathered about that sun of righteousness, and then, swift as the clouds disperse at dawn, all these cloudy veils rolled away, and they arose from the darkness into light—became the light of the world, their higher spiritual life had awakened. The spiritual power, truth, and grace of Christ revived them—when it took possession of them—at the very moment they felt his loss most.

At this Easter season it is natural to think of that extraordinary upspringing of faith, love, and reforming activity in the first disciples after a period of faithless depression and spiritual darkness. Some, indeed, seem to think that it cannot be accounted for except on some hypothesis of a bodily risen Christ. They seem to think that that which the divine grace and truth as seen in Jesus failed to awake in them, the enthusiasm, hope, determination to carry on the work begun by Jesus, that all this was effected by some visible, tangible resurrection of Jesus in the body. They do not seem to realise what a calumny it is against the miraculous power of the simple divinity of grace and truth to awaken in us the like divinity and to lead us whithersoever it will, when they affirm that without a miracle of a very different and lower type men would not have been induced to pay homage to grace and truth for themselves. What a loose hold people have upon the spiritual, when they seem to themselves only to be able to believe in it when something of a quite material nature is enacted on its behalf!

No, the time had come for the disciples to awake from spiritual sleep and let Christ shine upon them. The conditions were being fitted for the dawn of a new and deeper spiritual insight. It is the eternal newness of life, that such risen beings see, and that keeps them fresh and young and daily like new creatures in a new world. If we be risen with Christ we shall know the joy of his "saving health" that comes from the healing in his wings. As we rise we are cured of earth's disease. Each better resurrection is medicinable. We look back like Moses on the Egyptian darkness, oppression and disease, and hear the Lord calling as of old, "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself."

THE SPRING-TIME RESURRECTION.

THE more closely we approximate to the order revealed in Nature, the better are we able to maintain health and happiness. Change and variety play wondrously in the life of man: rest and activity, sleep and awakening, death and resurrection are essential elements of a healthful existence.

The conditions of modern life are in flagrant opposition to the life suggested by Nature. But for the thrill in the air and the kindly promise of a limited sky, the inhabitant of one of our smoke-begrimed cities is hardly conscious of the eager gladness of the spring. He labours sluggishly through life, in buildings suggestive only of the money-making pursuit, in streets paralysing in their sordid ugliness. If he be "successful," then upon the altar of Mammon are sacrificed the youthful dreams of the ideal, the joy and beauty of the life with Nature, the quiet satisfaction of a well-ordered development.

He may dwell in the suburbs and enjoy the freshness of a pure atmosphere; but until he has steeped his soul in the beneficent influences of God's world of beauty, he will never know the true joy of his heritage as a child of humanity and an interpreter of the soul of the world.

In the majestic sweep of the seasons and in the periodic fulfilment of periodic promise, there is a lesson of deep import for the human wayfarer. The quiet sleep of winter breaks in the awakening of spring; the tender promise of April deepens into the glory of summer, the beauty of the flowers fades into the fruitage of autumn, and throughout we are conscious of an eternal order indicative of healthy soul-process. Until our lives show similar phenomena of change, until we learn to regard Nature as responsive to our highest and deepest moods and as able to minister of her fulness to our need of communion, we shall but inadequately understand how the whole creation teems with the life of God and how humanity finds much of its essential joy in perfected relations with the external world.

For the strained and anxious worker, wearied with the cares imposed by modern life, there comes the message: Nestle close to the heart of Nature, listen to her life-throbs, assure yourself of her resources, lay your life to hers and draw in the vital energy which makes for fulness of being. The cold winter with its hardship and discontent and seeming barrenness is but the preparation for newness of life; over the threshold of death we pass into the glory of the divine; the dreary sadness of sin breaks, at the touch of hope, into the eternal joy of promise; so must it be with us at the thought of the spring-tide of the soul.

A few short weeks ago, and the brown fields slept in the soft grey light of a cloudy sky, and by their sides the silent hedgerows, clad in sober suit, waited for the seasonal dawn; the trees stretched their bare branches against the subdued light of the sky. But now the fields are streaked with rays of emerald light; the hedges softly glow with virginal green; the trees, in all the gladness of creation, gaily shake their new-blown buds in the noontide sun, the very air tingles with the promise of life; the song of the birds, showered upon our thirsty ears, refreshes and enheartens us. We are conscious of the stirrings of a new life, and feel the mighty workings of creative power. Thank God for the spring-tide Gospel of Resurrection.

GLIMPSES OF UPPER EGYPT.

WE are indebted to Mrs. Moore, of Richmond, for the following interesting passages from a friend's letters:—

Cataract Hotel, Assouan,
Upper Egypt, Jan. 11, 1903.

"We have had a very pleasant, though cold, voyage up the Nile. We stayed three days at Luxor, and found wonderfully extended excavations at Karnak, another most extensive temple disclosed, and a smaller one, quite perfect and roofed, also a new Pylon (in ruins).

"We reached Assouan last night. It is as enchanting as ever, but much changed. The town is greatly grown: they have built a giant hotel on Elephantine Island, 'the Savoy'; an imposing English church in the Moorish style on an eminence south of the town, overlooking the river; and a beautiful hotel, 'the Cataract,' where we are staying, on a rocky height near the church.

"I have not yet been to Philæ, but I hear the river washes the base of the temples now; they have been greatly strengthened and shored up by competent engineers, so I hope the edifices will not suffer. At Assiout a large dam or barrage stretches right across the Nile; one of the arches swings aside to allow the steamer to pass through."

Cataract Hotel, Feb. 17, 1903.

"We had a perfectly delightful visit to Khartoum and Omdurman. My mother enjoyed every minute of the time, and is all the better for the splendidly invigorating air of the Soudan. The voyage up the Nile to the second cataract was as enchanting as ever, but the face of Nubia is altered. For a hundred miles the Nile is converted into a vast lake, villages and palm groves all submerged; new and prosperous villages and commencing cultivation are already established on the higher land or the new shores. None of the Nubian temples are injured, and the influence of the dam ceases below Korosko.

"Abu Simbal is as beautiful as ever, and not a hair's breadth different from what it was. I feel it a great privilege to have again seen that most wonderful of all temples.

"We saw the sun rise twice and illumine the faces of those grand sitting figures, and watched them, calm, far-seeing, dignified, blush as it were into life.

"On reaching Wady Halfa we went at once on board the desert train especially contrived for the long hot journey of 232 miles across a waterless desert; nothing to be seen but the blazing sun on blazing sand. We were two nights and a day in this train on the way to Halfyeh, where we left the train and proceeded by launch to Khartoum. It is indeed a train-de-luxe—every comfort, and luxurious contrivances to keep out the heat are provided, and the sleeping accommodation is that of the most perfectly appointed hotel; the food, too, is wonderful. We saw splendid mirages: blue lakes reflecting islands, once a ship drifting over a calm sea, a fairy-like palace embowered in trees, not palm trees, and reflected in a still clear lake. They lasted all day. Sometimes it looked as if the train must enter the water. Many people tried to photograph these wonderful illusions, but the view-finder of the camera showed no picture at all, nothing but sand quivering in the heat. We passed Abu-Hamad, Berber, Shendi, and the Atbara river, all places familiar to us by reason of the Soudan war. Khartoum is a most interesting place, planned on a grand scale. At present only the river front is finished, where stands the Sirdar's palace (on the site of Gordon's old one), handsome houses, government buildings, and the Gordon College. It is a fine large building, not beautiful externally, but airy, spacious and well adapted for its purpose. It is still in a very unfinished condition and cannot yet be used, but primary schools, in connection with it, are established already and doing good work at Khartoum, Omdurman, Kassala, Berber and other places. We visited it and all places of interest in Khartoum and Omdurman, where we saw the Khalifa's house, Slatin Pasha's house (the house he now lives in is a beautiful one in Khartoum, as the Inspector-General of the Soudan), the Mahdi's ruined tomb, the Beit-el-Amana, or storehouse where is Gordon's piano, wrecked by the Dervishes after they murdered him. We visited the markets of gum, ivory, ostriches and camels, the bazaars, and the battlefield where the bones of the fallen still whiten the plain. Another day we gave to a voyage up the White Nile, where crocodiles, rhinoceros, hippopotamus and giraffes abound, also many strange and interesting birds. The White Nile is a grand river, immensely wide, far wider than the Nile in Egypt. The climate was quite cool and the air delightfully invigorating.

"What society there is in Khartoum is most interesting. Sir Reginald Wingate is the present Sirdar and Governor-General. He and his staff and the officials connected with Gordon College make a most desirable circle. There are a few ladies, wives of officials. We had met going out to Egypt the new sanitary inspector and bacteriologist of the Soudan, a young Scotchman. He and his wife are charming people. They were fairly established in their home by the time we reached Khartoum, and it was a great pleasure and advantage to us to meet them again there. A hotel at Khartoum has been open three months, and is wonderfully comfortable."

THE NAZARETH QUESTION.

Canon Cheyne in the article "Nazareth" in the "Encyclopædia Biblica" puts forth the startling surmise that there may have been no "city called Nazareth" existing in the time of Jesus, and that at any rate the name Nazareth was originally attached to a large district—in fact, to the whole province of Galilee.

No such town as Nazareth, he tells us, is mentioned in the Old Testament, in Josephus, or in the Talmud; and there are two New Testament passages which may well suggest a doubt whether Nazareth was at that time the name of a town at all.

One of these is Matt. ii. 23: "And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, 'He shall be called a Nazarene.'" The term "city" we are to disregard, for the theory goes behind the existing text of the gospels. The question is, to what prophecy is reference here made? It cannot, says Dr. Cheyne, be held with any probability to refer, as a current interpretation would have it do, to the "neser" or "branch" of Is. xi. 1, but is rather to be taken as an allusion to Is. ix. 1. "In the former time he brought into contempt the land of Zebulon and the land of Naphtali, but in the latter times hath he made it glorious, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the nations." But if the allusion is to that prophecy, and if that prophecy, as he thinks to be likely, was taken by the early Christians to predict the whole Galilean ministry of Jesus, then "Nazarene" must be taken to mean Galilean, and "Nazareth" to mean Galilee in general.

The other passage upon which our critic relies is John i. 45: "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" There is, it seems, some ground for supposing that the τι ἀγαθόν should be ὁ ἅγιος, and that the true reading is therefore, "Can the Holy One proceed from Nazareth?" Comparing this with John vii. 41, "Doth the Christ come out of Galilee?" it is inferred once more that Nazareth is synonymous with Galilee; an inference which is considered to be supported by comparing it with the following passages:—Matt. xxvi. 69: "Thou also wast with Jesus the Galilean." Matt. xxvii. 71: "This man also was with Jesus the Nazarene"

If, now, we grant that Nazareth is equivalent to Galilee, an obscure phrase which occurs in the Talmud is said to be explained. The phrase in question may be read "Bethlehem noseriyyah," Bethlehem near Nazareth, or, in the district of Nazareth, which our author takes to be identical with "the Galilean Bethlehem," just as the southern Bethlehem was called Bethlehem of Judah.

We now (so he observes) begin to see why Nazareth was called the "fatherland" (πατρίς) of Jesus. It was called so, not because Jesus was born or brought up in a town called Nazareth, but because he was a native of the district Nazareth (i.e., Galilee). His real birthplace was probably Bethlehem of Galilee, which would account for some of the discrepancies in the birth narratives, and for the apparently discordant traditions—on the one side that he was born at Nazareth, and on the other that he was born at Bethlehem.

Now, with respect to the theory that Bethlehem of Galilee was the true birthplace of Jesus, I must acknowledge that it seems on other grounds to have a considerable degree of probability, but the argument upon which the great scholar bases the theory that the name Nazareth stands, not for a town, but for the whole province of Galilee, carries, I must confess, no conviction to my unlearned mind. Perhaps I have too briefly summarised the argument, and have not given sufficient weight to the cumulative effect of various slight indications. Upon that my readers can judge for themselves by reading the full article in the "Encyclopædia." But taking the points which I have set forth above to be the salient points, I cannot feel them to be very penetrating.

As to the argumentum a silentio, it is always a dangerous argument, and there is really no reason why Nazareth, especially if it was a small place, should necessarily be mentioned in Hebrew or Jewish literature; while the Scriptural and Talmudic passages, though they may possibly admit (in their conjectured primitive forms) of the equation Nazareth = Galilee, admit equally well, one would say, even in those conjectured forms, of the supposition that Nazareth was a town with a village, Bethlehem, near to it. Bethlehem, as a matter of fact, is only seven miles from the existing town of Nazareth, lying at the foot of the hills upon which Nazareth stands.

As to the assertion that Nazareth is spoken of as the "fatherland" of Jesus, there are but eight verses in the New Testament in which his πατρίς is spoken of, and every one of these eight refers to the self-same event, while none of them necessarily implies that Nazareth (i.e., Galilee) was the πατρίς spoken of. Matthew's statement (and the others are similar) is this: "And coming into his own country (πατρίς) he taught them in their synagogue." But such a statement, so far from going to prove that Galilee is the "country" spoken of, tells rather the other way, otherwise Galilee might be supposed to contain only one synagogue. The passage is much more consistent with the idea that the "country" in question means simply the district, undefined, but not extensive, round about his native town. It is, in fact, just such an expression as might be used if Jesus had been born at Bethlehem of Galilee and had gone to preach at Nazareth—to preach, that is to say, not in his own town, but in a town in his own district.

Against the negative surmise there is, moreover, one positive though not perhaps conclusive fact to be set—namely, the existence of ancient rock-cut tombs up the hill toward the west of the modern town. This fact is passed over by the writer of the article with a "notwithstanding," but it is, I cannot but think, significant. These old remains are a sure sign that a town or village of some sort stood here in very early times. What, then, was the name of that town or village? We know from innumerable instances that for thousands of years the names of places in Palestine will cling to the old sites; yet for this site there is no name known but that of en-Nâsira, a name which has belonged to it at any rate from the fourth century, for Eusebius mentions it. And this, taken with the fact that at an earlier date still, when the gospels of Matthew and Luke took their present form, there was believed to have existed in Galilee a πόλις λεγομένη Ναζαρέτ, surely forms rather strong presumptive evidence that this is no other than the Nazareth which is eleven times mentioned in the gospels, and four times called a "city."

PROFESSOR STANLEY HALL ON SUNDAY SCHOOL AND BIBLE TEACHING.

Professor Stanley Hall is the leader of the Child Study movement in the United States, and editor of the Pedagogical Seminary. In that magazine (December, 1901) he published a long article entitled "Some Fundamental Principles of Sunday-school and Bible Teaching." This article is written from what may be called the Child Study point of view, and a short summary of some of its leading contentions may be of interest to readers of The Inquirer. Psychology, Professor Hall tells us, presents a new standpoint in looking primarily at the nature, needs, and power of the growing soul of childhood during its successive stages, and in basing methods of teaching upon this knowledge. Accordingly the following principles are advocated:—

(1.) The Old Testament should predominate over the New for boys and girls before the dawn of adolescence. It is a cardinal principle of pedagogy that Interest is the best index of capacity or pedagogical ripeness. It is, like hunger, an expression of need. Now young children lead a life eminently objective; they look outward, and should not be encouraged to look inward. They love exciting events, battles, the flood, and tower. They admire character, for this is an age of intense hero-worship. It is the age, too, of justice (cf. games enjoyed at this time). The sense of law looms up in human life before that of the Gospel. The Old Testament has a great variety of stirring events, a large repertory of persons, dramatic and romantic incidents. The Old Testament stimulates profoundly the sentiments of awe and reverence on which religion rests in the human soul, and which precede the dawn of the altruistic impulses.

(2.) The second and somewhat complementary principle is that the New Testament is chiefly for adolescence. Jesus was animated by the great principle of love and self-sacrifice, and these motives cannot be comprehended by the mind or amply felt by the heart until the dawn of that great physical regeneration when love takes up the harp of life. Boys before twelve or fourteen have normally little interest in the character, life or teachings of Jesus, and it is a bad sign if they do. There is little in their souls that responds to the Gospel. It is easy to work up an artificial interest, but the danger is that precocious interest in Jesus will result in conceptions of his character and work that will dwarf adequate ideas later. . . . Jesus came to and for adolescents in a very special and peculiar, and till lately not understood sense; and just as it is pedagogically wrong to force him upon childhood it is wrong not to teach him to adolescents. Their need is so great as to constitute a mission motive of even more warmth and force than those that now prevail. This I can urge with a full heart and mind upon Turk, Jew, atheist and idolator, and I believe that everyone well trained and instructed in modern psychology and pedagogy could do the same, even though he denied all the supernatural traits and incidents in the life of Jesus, or even thought him a myth. He could still say this grand tradition or ideal is true to the human heart and experience because it finds it and saves it better than anything else at this stage.

(3.) In teaching Jesus his humanity should be first inculcated with wise reticence concerning his deity and all the supernatural elements in the Gospels. With little children we can and should teach at Christmas the nativity, and at the Lenten season the death and resurrection. At the very least, whatever the parents' need, these are current traditions without understanding and feeling which the child is unintelligent and ignorant of much that is best in art and literature. . . . Here all Sunday-school teachers should sit at the feet of our Unitarian friends. A careful study of their copious Sunday-school literature convinces me that whatever may be said of it or of them, nothing so fits the nature and needs of children in the early adolescent studies of Jesus as their methods and ideals.

(4.) Have stories predominate, especially for young children. What may be called the Sunday-school parts of both the Old and New Testament are mainly narrative. Events are chronicled in the temporal order in which they occurred. The relation between ancient story and history is even closer than the two words suggest. I plead for a new profession—that of story-teller in the Sunday-school. (The memorising of texts and proverbs, and the use of pictures are also advocated.)

(5.) I plead also for the use of very select tales and other matters with a moral bearing from non-Bible sources. Scripture, we must not forget, became Bible by inherent interest, merit and worth.

(6.) Nature teaching is referred to as a means of developing the religious sentiments. The aim should be to foster a love of Nature rather than to attempt technical scientific teaching.

(7.) I plead for more purely intellectual instruction, first for the Old Testament in its season, then during the earlier years of adolescence for the New. The deplorable fact now generally admitted is that children go through our entire courses, and emerge with an almost incredible ignorance of the Bible. In this respect we have very much to learn from other religions. The best Jewish Sabbath-schools I have seen teach not only Old Testament history but Jewish history, down to the present time as well. Promotions are made by examination only. The best Catholic schools I know incite the children by competition and prizes, and award diplomas for the completion of the course which is marked, as in so many other religious bodies, by confirmation.

(8.) The miraculous should have a prominent place, and has a great function. I cannot agree with some of my friends of the ultra-Unitarian and free religious camp that the supernatural has no place in the religious education of the young, but hold on the contrary that it has a place almost central and supreme. I insist that we misconceive and misteach it. Here as elsewhere education must begin with the rudiments and repeat the history of the race. Every child is through and through a fetish worshipper at a certain stage.

(9.) A complete and ideal Sunday-school should make provision for matured and cultivated young men and women according to principles not yet recognised. The Pauline writings are to some extent suited for this, but certainly not to earlier periods. This is true also, but to a less extent, for the prophecies, which, however, pedagogically precede. Here, too, there should be some study of patristics and Church history. It would be ideal, also, to have a little comparative study of the great ethnic religions with a taste of the philosophy of religion. The atmosphere should invite growth and expansion. This should be essentially a stage of inquiry. Criticism, higher and lower, and all the general standpoints and moral ideals which are so formative, but so often repressed and neglected, belong here.

This is a very condensed summary, chiefly in Professor Hall's own words, of a very interesting article which contains many ideas and suggestions well worthy of careful consideration by all who are concerned for the welfare of our Sunday-schools. The idea running through the whole paper, that methods of education should be adapted to the nature of the being to be educated, is now very generally accepted so far as ordinary mental education is concerned. There can be no doubt that it is equally applicable to religious teaching, and accordingly, in our Sunday-schools, it becomes necessary not merely to keep in view the supreme purpose of all our teaching, but to take cognisance of the various stages of spiritual growth, and to make use of whatever methods of education are best adapted to the needs of each stage.

The emphasis laid by Professor Hall upon the importance of the adolescent period is most opportune. All recent studies of adolescence, and they are many, agree in recognising this period as one of great interest to the religious teacher. Now, if ever, religion, which to the child is an outward law, must become an inward spirit. Professor Hall would have religious teaching at this epoch focus upon the life of Christ, and in view of the question so often asked among us as to what becomes of our elder scholars, his words seem deserving of serious attention. From a point of view which cannot be described as other than "advanced," he agrees with the most orthodox Christian as to how alone the spiritual hunger and thirst of adolescence can be satisfied.

Professor Hall's views with regard to the use of "miracle" in Sunday-school teaching are also of interest, coming as they do from an advanced thinker, and we regret that he has not elaborated his opinions more fully. It is, perhaps, a good rule that we should not be too rationalistic with children; but at the same time the teacher owes it to himself as well as to his pupils to teach the truth as he sees it, and to teach nothing as truth which he believes to be untrue. Doubtless Professor Hall means nothing contrary to this, but he does not tell us how we can honestly meet the difficulty of teaching certain parts of the Bible to children where history and myth are inextricably mingled. It is not in connection with such stories as the creation legends that the real difficulty has to be faced. Few of us believe that myth is entirely confined to the Old Testament, yet in teaching the New where can the teacher find guidance who realises on the one hand the duty of teaching the truth, and on the other the danger, the very real danger, that a precocious rationalism may obscure the reality of Christian history and weaken the claims of Christian discipleship. But we have no wish to enter upon any discussion of Professor Hall's paper, and with these few words would leave it to the consideration of our readers.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Atherton (Chowbent).—A Sale of Work, held on Wednesday and Thursday week, by which it was hoped to raise £150, realised upwards of £184. A substantial parcel has also been sent to the Twentieth Century Fund Bazaar, towards which the school has already contributed £9 in cash.

Bootle.—The April Calendar of the Free Church records very satisfactory results of the recent Sale of Work. Sixty pounds was the sum aimed at, and it is expected that the actual amount cleared will not be less than £80.

Chatham (Resignation).—The Rev. G. S. Hitchcock, having determined to enter the communion of the Roman Catholic Church, closed his ministry at the Hamond-hill Church on Sunday, March 29.

Derby.—The Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., whose retirement from the ministry of the Friar-gate Chapel was recently announced, has received and accepted a hearty and unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Old Meeting, Great Yarmouth, which includes also that of Filby, to commence duties at the earliest possible date. Mr. Birks has been minister of the Friar-gate Chapel for twenty years, and during that period the endowment has been increased, and the late Mr. Councillor John Jackson's residence, Brook Villa, given to the congregation; whilst, in addition to the regular seat-rents, anniversary collections, offertories, and subscriptions for other allied purposes, a sum of upwards of £2,221 has been raised for improvements and furtherance of the cause in Derby. Mr. Birks was a member of the Board of Guardians, Chairman of the Borough Asylum Visiting Committee, Charity Organisation Society Committee, and of the Sunday Committee of the Royal Infirmary also Chairman of the Markeaton Ward Liberal Association, Vice-President of the Derby Liberal Association, and of the Derby and District Liberal Club.

Dundee.—At the School Board Election last week, the Rev. H. Williamson stood fourth among the successful candidates. Canon Holder headed the poll with 18,232 votes, Mr. Williamson obtained 12,323, the last of the fifteen successful candidates only 6,624.

Leicester: Great Meeting. — On Friday evening, April 3, a congregational soirée was held in the school to welcome the Rev. E. W. Lummis, who on Sunday entered on his ministry, in succession to the Rev. Henry Gow, now of Hampstead. The Chairman of the Vestry, Mr. A. H. Paget, presided over a very large attendance, which included many representatives of the sister church in Leicester. The Chairman, in an interesting address, said that night marked the opening of a fresh and important chapter in the history of the Great Meeting. Their history did not consist of many chapters, but some were in length quite exceptional. In about five years they hoped to celebrate the bi-centenary. In the days of Queen Anne a band of Christians, separatists from the Established Church, acquired ground just inside the Old Town Wall, on which they raised the Meeting-house, which stands to-day the oldest in Leicester. And now with their roots in the past they turned a new leaf. Mr. Lummis, at their unanimous request, had accepted their pulpit. Years ago he took his line and cast his lot with those who desired a progressive view of truth, and under his guidance the congregation would seek truth reverently, fearlessly, and hopefully, and with these aspirations and in the name of the congregation he offered the heartiest welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Lummis; might the union be long, happy, and fraught with blessings to all concerned. Mr. E. Clephan, a former chairman of vestry, followed, and, in joining very heartily in the welcome to the new minister and his wife, pointed out that in the last 100 years the church had had only four ministers—Mr. Berry, Mr. Coe, Mr. Hopps, and Mr. Gow. During the whole of his long experience of that church the greatest harmony had prevailed, and he was sure this would continue under Mr. Lummis's pastorate. In conclusion, Mr. Clephan dwelt on the fact that there was a responsibility on the part of the congregation as well as its minister, and they should see to it that they supported and encouraged Mr. Lummis in his work. Mr. E. F. Cooper (also an ex-chairman of the vestry), Mr. Russell Gimson (on behalf of the Sunday-school), and the Rev. W. Whitaker (of the Free Christian Church) also joined in the welcome, and, after an interval for refreshments, the speeches were continued. The Chairman first read a telegram from the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas (Nottingham) expressing regret at inability to attend, and offering congratulations both to Mr. Lummis and the congregation, after which the Rev. J. C. Street (of Shrewsbury) gave an address, commending the church for the wisdom of its choice, and the Rev. E. W. Lummis for his acceptance of the pulpit. There was, he added, need in these times for their free Christian churches, which made for the unification of the discordant elements in the Christian life of to-day. Mr. Lummis then acknowledged the cordiality of the welcome extended to him. He first warned the congregation against the danger of expecting too much to be accomplished speedily, but the principles of the past, for which that congregation had stood so long, he took to himself, and he would set to work in the hope of quietly and unostentatiously doing good in the town. He trusted the congregation might increase in numbers and usefulness, and that the union might result in furthering the great cause to which they were all devoted. He hoped that throughout his ministry they would remain a united congregation, working to destroy any factions or differences which might arise. During the evening the choir rendered several excellent selections, and the proceedings concluded with the Benediction, pronounced by the new pastor.

Liverpool: Ullet-road (Resignation).—The Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, D.Sc., who became the minister of Renshaw-street Chapel in 1895, moving with his congregation in 1899 to the new Ullet-road Church, has resigned his charge, and the resignation has been accepted with much regret.

London: Islington.—By the kindness of Mr. Harold Wooding, of the Newington Green Church, a most successful entertainment was given on Monday last in the lecture hall of Unity Church. The proceeds were devoted to the funds of the Girls' Club, which were largely augmented. Mr. Wooding brought with him the choir and a number of friends, and with this real wealth of talent, delighted the very large audience present. The programme consisted of songs, glees, recitations, and instrumental music, and concluded with a sketch entitled "Trixie," from the pen of Mr. Wooding. Mr. J. W. S. Appleton acted as accompanist.

Manchester District Association.—The eighth visit of the Governing Body was paid on Saturday last to the church at Swinton. The Rev. Walter Reynolds conducted the service, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks preached. The sermon was from Peter's response to the question, "But who say ye that I am?" The interpretation was unusual, and it led to a fine sermon, which was most attentively followed. The service over, everybody made for the schoolroom, where tea was provided. It is an attractive room, and was seen at its best, for the young men, anxious to make the visitors most heartily welcome, had during the week preceding cleaned and decorated it. Mr. George referred to this with proper pride when extending a welcome to the members of the Governing Body and friends from other churches later on. The attendance at these services and meetings is steadily improving, and it was found that the 137 present at service had been increased to 190 when the meeting had been in progress some time. Mr. Dendy, a vice-president of the Association, took the chair and delivered an impressive address. Feeling his way to the temper of the meeting, and anxious that everything transpiring should be on a high level, he struck the note of earnestness that has been unmistakable in all the preceding meetings. The fellowship of these regular services and meetings in which members from all the churches join, will do much to prevent that "inevitable decay" which Dr. Martineau saw must follow upon isolated church life. The audience, responsive to the chairman, seized the good points Mr. C. B. Byles and Mr. Richard Robinson made in their vigorous addresses. Mr. Robinson seems to be getting much interesting experience out of his connection with Manchester Unitarians, who amaze him with their ability to take a talking-to with applause; and delight him by treating their ministers as themselves—hard workers in the common cause. The Rev. Dendy Agate followed with one of his usual bright and cheering speeches. During the evening the choir and some of its members added variety by their well-chosen musical selections. Really there is nothing to wonder at in the steadily increasing appreciation of these monthly visits, which in a larger way are encouraging the fine old idea of the one-ness of the household of the faith.

Shrewsbury (Reopening Services).—The High-street Church was reopened on Thursday, April 2, after extensive renovation and alterations. The present building, which dates from 1691, took the place of a yet earlier Nonconformist meeting-house. Once in the period of the Hanoverian settlement it was destroyed by rioters and rebuilt by the Government, who at the same time presented to the church a painting of the Royal Arms, which has hung over the pulpit to this day (!). A new floor has now been put in and the old pews are replaced by more comfortable seats. Venetian artists have supplied some mosaic work in front of the pulpit, addition has been made to the electric lighting, the organ has been renovated and brought downstairs to a new recess by the pulpit, and new choir stalls and reading desk have been added. The schoolroom has been enlarged, and chapel and school both rejoice in fresh paint. Of the total cost, £750, a large part has already been raised. The opening service was preceded by a public luncheon at the County Restaurant. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street, minister of the church, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham. After tea a public meeting was held in the church, the Rev. J. C. Street presiding. Mr. R Mansell, secretary of the church, made a statement as to the work now completed, and addresses were given by the Revs. E. A. Voysey, A. A. Charlesworth, C. D. Badland, Mr. J. W. Woodall, and the Chairman. On Sunday the opening services were continued, being conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street. The collections in aid of the Alterations Fund amounted to nearly £30.

Yarmouth (Appointment).—The Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., of Derby, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pulpit of the Old Meeting, and will shortly enter upon his duties, which include the charge also of Filby.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN Liverpool our National Conference was born in 1882, and there it will next week celebrate its majority. No happier place of meeting could be found. Its churches are among the finest in our fellowship, with great traditions of devotion, of generosity, and of honourable citizenship. If the week was not so crowded with engagements, we should have something to say of its glorious river and the neighbouring country. But Conference hospitality, we understand, has been asked only for Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday nights, and there is a great deal of business to be done! We trust that it is everywhere clearly understood that not ministers and delegates only, but all friends are free to attend all the services and meetings, though, of course, at the business meeting only ministers and delegates can vote.

MANCHESTER visitors to the Conference who are inquiring about railway warrants, carrying the privilege of reduced fares, are asked to note that the Rev. Charles Peach, of 68, Richmond-grove, is acting as Manchester secretary for the distribution of these warrants, which may be had on application to him.

THE Conference Guide Book has reached us too late for more than the briefest notice. It has a charming cover, and contains the whole order of proceedings, with much other useful matter, and some interesting historical notes. On p. 48 Robert Lewis at Benn's Garden should be Lewin.

VISITORS to the Liverpool Conference who have not been to Port Sunlight should take the steamer across to New Ferry, or train to Bromborough and see what kind of a village can be provided for their workpeople by enlightened manufacturers. They will not find a system at work which solves the land and housing question, for the property belongs entirely to Messrs. Lever Brothers, the proprietors of the factory, and the beautiful and healthy conditions under which the people live are part of the business enterprise of the firm whereby they attract the best workers and keep them, and train up a healthy and happy race to follow after. But they will see something of the benefits of a well-considered plan in laying out and building dwellings, of the application of artistic skill in the erection of workmen's houses, and of that kind of enlightened self-interest which is akin to philanthropy.

WE are glad to be able to publish in our present issue a full review by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers of Professor Jean Réville's lectures on Liberal Protestantism, recently published in Paris. Dr. Odgers is now far away, sailing the Ægean Sea, but we are to have the pleasure of welcoming M. Réville at the Conference in Liverpool next week.

IF acts of Parliament were made or rejected anywhere but at Westminster, the new Education Bill might be regarded, as Dr. Macnamara says, as already dead and done for. The faint praise of the Government's supporters should damn it as effectually as the loud contempt of their opponents. Unfortunately Bills are not so easily dismissed, and the Government stands so clearly bound to do something that it cannot readily screen its unwisdom behind the plea of stress of other business, such as the Irish Land Bill, and withdraw its singularly inept proposals. It is not only that the step taken last year with regard to the rest of the country demands (as is said) a measure to bring London's affairs level with others, be the levelling up or down; the cry of the "Voluntary" schools in the metropolis is piteous, and a Government which exists for its friends' sake must not neglect that cry. Added to these considerations, it must be remembered that the Government's dislike of the School Board for London is only less keen than its fear of the London County Council. On the whole, we shall not yet awhile be over sanguine as to the withdrawal of the Bill.

THE fear which we have just mentioned is but too obvious in the measure introduced last week. The County Council is not to have in London a power similar to that of provincial councils. It must supply the money, but even upon the general committee to be charged with the administration of the Act, its members are to be but a little over one-third of the total number. What is still worse, not only from the point of view of the Council, but from the far more serious point of view of the work of the schools, the borough councils are to be the choosers of sites and the appointers of staff. Those who know the inner working of the present system know exactly what that means. It has been enormously difficult to keep out jobbery and favouritism as it is, with a central authority in command which could not easily be swayed by purely personal or local interests. The scheme foreshadowed by Sir William Anson's Bill is bad in many ways, but, so far as educational efficiency is concerned, in none worse than this.

IT is specially noteworthy that the National Union of Teachers, which at its last Easter Conference gave a qualified welcome to the Bill of 1902, has most emphatically denounced this year's Bill as a blow to educational efficiency. We should observe that the Union includes members of different sects and political parties. The unanimous verdict of such a body is not to be set aside lightly as the opinion of persons interested professionally. Sir George Kekewich has rendered this year's Conference memorable by his unsparing denunciation of the tactics by which he was removed from his post at the Education Department, and by his remarkable testimony to the valuable work done by the London School Board. He declared that that Board had done more in a shorter time and for more people than any other existing administrative body. Obviously he was not the man to be retained by a Government which, as Sir William Anson naively said, introduced this year's Bill to destroy the Board; but the intrigue underlying these proceedings is particularly discreditable to those who share in the responsibility of undoing a system of which a year or two ago they were unfeignedly proud.

WE must all rejoice that the Conference

next week will be asked to reaffirm the principles of religious liberty and civic right which are violated by last year's Act, and which this year's Bill proposes to set at nought once more. Mr. Richard D. Holt and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie will respectively move and second are solution similar in terms to one passed at the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association last year. Such iteration is needed in these days of confusion when the sons of men who fought for liberty, and some of the fathers themselves, find it convenient (it cannot be easy) to ignore ideals which were once cherished by them in accord with our country's most enlightened statesmen. Of course the resolution will be carried, but who will din it effectually into the ears of the men whom once we trusted, but who now stand by nodding approval at this policy of scandalous reaction?

Like ourselves, the Congregational churches are feeling the inadequacy of pure and simple Congregationalism to the altered condition of our social life, and to the religious needs of modern times. Congregationalism stands for "Individualism" in church life, and for the idea that each church is a self contained and self-sufficing whole. The migration of the population from the country to the towns has made the self-sufficing church of rural districts a thing of the past. They are no longer "Independent," but live largely on the help of others. Again, the decay in our great towns of residential districts for well-to-do people has brought the once flourishing Congregational Church into sad decreptitude, demanding a total change of method if the church is not to be abandoned—a change we see in process at Claremont and Whitfield's Tabernacle, where the churches no longer profess Independency, but are entirely supported by the co-operation of the whole body of London Congregationalism. Other causes are also at work calling for less of individualism and more of collective action. A deeper sense of unity, and the more strongly felt need of the power which united action brings, the growth of the idea that the scattered and solitary churches need to federate into a church, a single community of which all are members, the necessity of preventing the waste and confusion of overlapping funds, societies, and colleges—these are some of the influences that have moved Congregationalists to seek a closer fellowship and a more real and vital cohesion. Dr. Parker gave voice to this growing feeling two years ago in his address on "The Congregational Church," and since then the Committee of the Union has been at work on a scheme which shall give these ideas a practical shape. The scheme—an elaborate document—is now published, and is to be presented to the Union at its meetings in May, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Churches for consideration, with a view to a final decision in twelve months' time.

The scheme proposes to set up in connection with the Union a Council of 300, two-thirds to be laymen. This Council will be the executive of the Union, and it will appoint eight committees for the detailed work. One of the committees will deal with Church Aid, Sustentation, and Superannuation, and the hope is expressed that the work in these directions, now carried on by other bodies not directly representative of the churches will be transferred to the Union. There are to be Committees for Church Building, Literature, Finance, Education, &c. A new and most important committee will deal with ministerial settlements and removals, and with the recognition of ministers coming over from other denominations. Another committee will deal with Guilds and the Young People's Union, while the Council, as a whole, is to consider the relation of the colleges to the Union and to each other, with a view to secure, where possible and desirable, their amalgamation. The Council is also to confer with the trustees of various beneficiary funds connected with the denomination in order to promote their co-ordination and the more advantageous distribution of their grants.

These are momentous and far-reaching proposals, bound to provoke considerable differences of opinion, but bound also to lead to some change in present methods. In two or three directions they are suggestively like some of the proposals to be submitted next week to the National Conference, and it is not without significance that the way of progress, both for the Congregationalists and ourselves, should seem by men in both communities to run along very much the same lines.

The notice in last week's Inquirer of the reissue of the Rev. James Cranbrook's "Founders of Christianity" has elicited letters from two correspondents who knew him personally, and there are certainly others who might from similar knowledge add to what these have told us. It is gratifying that in the main our impression gathered from the book corresponds with what they cherish who knew the man. Perhaps the most significant fact communicated to us is that he was for a brief period a Unitarian minister. This was at Newhall-hill Chapel, Birmingham, of which he was the first regular minister—the date being 1848-1850. Before that time he had been a Congregationalist, and he appears to have soon discovered that his former spiritual home was perhaps more liberal, certainly more congenial to him than the somewhat hard and rigorous household of faith, as it then was, into which his heretical turn had led him. He is described as at this period "a slight, handsome, refined-looking man, beaming with intelligence and unaffected goodness." In addition to the work named above he published another, a volume of sermons entitled "Credibilia." In the Midlands, at Liscard, and in Edinburgh, he left behind him memories of a personality singularly creative of goodness in others.

In a notice of the first number of the Burlington Magazine for Connoisseurs a fortnight ago, it was said by mistake to be published by the Savoy Publishing Co. It should have been the Savill Publishing Co., 14, New Burlington-street, W.

Hold fast upon God with one hand, and open wide the other to your neighbour; that is religion; that is the law and the prophets, and the true way to all better things that are yet to come.

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION.

The Annual Meeting of the subscribers and friends was held at the Mission, Mill-street, on Wednesday evening, April 8, the chair being occupied by the retiring president, Mr. Walter Holland.

The report of the Committee and the Treasurer's statement of accounts were read, and adopted on the motion of the Chairman, seconded by the Rev. W. J. Jupp.

The report referred to the fact that ten years had elapsed since the removal to the Mill-street premises, and on account of the increase in the work, pleaded for an accession of workers, especially for the Sunday-school.

The Committee considered that the removal had been fully justified by the results. They commented on the generous gift of the new wing by Mr. Holland, and on the equipment of the whole building with the electric light, this improvement, among others, having been rendered possible by a legacy of £500 from the late Mr. Henry Tate. The report alluded with gratification to the beneficent action of the licensing bench in reducing the number of licenses to a more reasonable proportion, and expressed a hope that the same firm and wise policy would be followed in the future.

The statement of accounts showed that the balance due to the Treasurer had increased by some £200, a further accession of subscribers being therefore urgently called for.

The resolution of sympathy with the missionaries and volunteer workers was moved by Mr. Richard Robinson, a very old worker in the Mission, who had come over from Manchester especially to attend the meeting.

Mr. Charles W. Jones seconded, and, referring to the action of the licensing bench, remarked that the justices would not be influenced in the slightest by the observations which had recently fallen from the Lord Chancellor and Prime Minister.

The resolution was supported by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, and, being carried with acclamation, was responded to by the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Joseph Anderton, who have now been connected with the Mission twenty and twenty-four years respectively.

Mr. Arthur Hall moved the election of the Committee, with Mr. Richard D. Holt as President and Mr. Holland as Treasurer. This was seconded by Mr. A. Cooper and carried.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman concluded the proceedings, being moved by Mr. Richard D. Holt and seconded by Councillor Herbert Rathbone.

The meeting was rather smaller than usual, but was representative of our various local churches.

The Rev. R. A. Armstrong wrote regretting that absence in London would prevent his attending.

Amongst others present, besides those mentioned above, were Councillor Robert D. Holt, Councillor R. R. Meade-King, Rev. H. W. Hawkes, Rev. J. Morley Mills, Mr. and Mrs. F. Robinson, Miss Bonring, Mrs. Mulleneux, Mrs. R. C. Hall, Miss Maughan, Mr. C. S. Jones, Miss Booth, Mrs. Richard D. Holt, Miss Meade-King, Mr. and Mrs. B. P. Burroughs, Mrs. H. Coventry, Mr. Forwood Heyn, Mr. H. Coventry, Hon. Sec.

LITERATURE.

PROFESSOR JEAN RÉVILLE ON LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM.*

M. Jean Réville is known to us in this country not only as a scholar and critic of the first rank, and as editor of the Revue de l'histoire des Religions, but as the leader of the liberal wing of the Reformed Church of France, and the champion and defender of its principles and its rights. The little volume before us contains five lectures delivered by him at Geneva in November last, under the auspices of the Swiss Union of Liberal Christianity. The lecturer explains that his purpose was not polemical, that he spoke not as a partisan or as a preacher, but as a professor of religious science, bent upon setting before his hearers the materials of personal conviction. Though many of them entertained no sympathy with the principles of the Union, this "admirable audience—such as can be found only in cities where public spirit has been formed for centuries in the school of free inquiry," listened with rapt attention to M. Réville's exposition of the principles of Liberal Protestantism, and he dedicates his book to those who, like the Genevese, desire to attain precision of thought, and to form reasoned opinion, on the subjects of which he treats.

The first lecture deals with the nature and genesis of Liberal Protestantism. Though it does not imply identity of opinion in all those who espouse its cause, it is to be regarded as an historical religion, not as a chance compound of survivals in sentiment and novelties in speculation. It attaches itself at once to the principles of the Reformation, and to the religion taught by Jesus Christ, claiming the right to regard both, without any infringement of loyalty, under conditions of evolution and development. The principles of the Reformers are seen, in retrospect, to detach themselves from the particular opinions maintained by them. In them, perhaps, the principles of free inquiry, and of the religious supremacy of the individual conscience, hardly ever passed out of a subconscious condition into distinct formulation; but they base their revolt upon the demand for sufficient evidence. The last word of Luther, at the Diet of Worms, is, "Unless I am convinced by the testimony of Scripture, or by clear arguments, I cannot and will not retract anything, for it is dangerous to act against one's own conscience." "What, to the first French Calvinists, stamps the authority of Holy Scripture? The testimony is inward persuasion of the Holy Spirit; that is, the profound recognition of truth on evidence convincing to the individual soul."

M. Réville points out, in a few interesting pages, that the Reformers, in their desire to show that Reformation did not mean heresy, took over, and enthroned side by side with the Bible, a mass of traditional doctrine. They were, in fact, "more ardently attached to orthodox dogma than the Catholic Church of their time." But in a short time the incompatibility of these two sources of authoritative doctrine became manifest, or, at least, was found embarrassing. And so the scope of reason in religion was being confined to technical controversy, or harmonistic effort, within the region of confessional theology: its true function was allotted to it, and the principle of free inquiry, inherent in Protestantism, attained full self-consciousness in the era of philosophical theology inaugurated by Descartes. The necessity for a rational view of Scripture made itself felt at once; but generations pass before rationalising effort gives place to mature historical and literary criticism. Our author recapitulates the substance of his first lecture in these words:—

> To be Protestant is not to submit one's self to the doctrine of Luther, of Calvin, or of any particular founder of Protestant Churches. It is to be inspired by the principles which were the raison d' être of their work, but which are independent of their personalities, and which must produce their natural fruits in proportion to their progressive development, and the ever fuller consciousness which they attain in the minds of their adherents. Supremacy of reason and conscience in matters of religion, as in all other domains of the mind's life—the historical authority of the Bible freely studied, with all the resources of science and apart from dogmatic prepossession—such are the constituent principles of Liberal Protestantism." (P. 31.)

The second lecture expounds the propositions "that Liberal Protestantism is founded on religious experience, and is the modern expression of the Christian Religion." The study of the Bible, in such ways as modern Protestantism is now prepared to recommend, leads to the perception of undeniable differences of religious value among the various parts and writings of the Old Testament; they severally stand nearer to, or farther from, those religious ideas which are to us the kernel of the whole, and the essential contribution of the Hebrew race to the faith of the world. Similarly, when we go to the New Testament for "the indispensable knowledge of the teachings and work of Christ," we encounter the same differences of relation, and have to sift out the testimony to the primitive gospel from the midst of later reflections and speculations. "Jesus cannot have taught, at one and the same time, the ideas of Paul, of John, of the Epistle to the Hebrews, of the Apocalypse." But our faith need not wait for the last word of historical criticism. Attachment to the Spirit of Christ, and the main principles of his teaching, and experience of their value and efficacy, are quite compatible with the conviction that much in the thought and language of Jesus, when we attain to that which is certainly his, is determined or coloured by the belief of his age, which can be no longer held.

> For there is not a man in the present day, be it well understood, who can form to himself the same notions as were held by Jesus and his Apostles, of God, angels and demons, of the physical world and its phenomena, in fact, of nature in its entirety. The truth as it shines out clearly from the history of Christianity, is, that you can have very different, even irreconcilable, doctrines upon the essence of God, on his government of the world, and be equally good and faithful disciples of Christ, from the moment when you entertain for God, as you conceive him, the feelings of submission, trust, love, consecration to his will, which Jesus claims for the Heavenly Father—from the moment when you make the effort to bring your actions and your whole life into conformity with these feelings. (P. 53.)

In a survey of the relation of Christianity to religion in its essence, we find that M. Réville is disposed to identify this essence with the sense of dependence, and to proclaim as a noteworthy meeting-point of faith and science the equivalence of the Augustinian and Calvinistic doctrine of the absolute sovranty of God and the absolute dependence of man, with what modern science calls the sovranty of the Universal Order. The lecture concludes with a glowing appeal to man's experience of the power of the Gospel apprehended in its religious and moral essence.

The third lecture deals with Liberal Protestantism in relation to moral experience. Rejecting the story of the Fall, and the dogma of Original Sin, the lecturer speaks of the great moral experiences of which these are symbolical expressions—the consciousness of sin and its universality; the sense of servitude imposed by evil; the notion of the solidarity of the race, not merely as a present fact, but as extending from generation to generation. This leads him to appeal very powerfully on behalf of the moral, in opposition to what may be called the ecclesiastical side of religion. The Gospel was a call to men "to be saints," to pass from darkness into light, to enter into the Kingdom of God. True, the early Christians, like all the "elect" in periods of religious exaltation, saw no children of light beyond their own circle; and we are aware of lights and shades of which they took no account. But when experience proved that the expectation of the Messiah's reign on earth was doomed to disappointment, the Church identified itself with the Kingdom of God on earth, and banished the Kingdom proper to Heaven. Salvation, regeneration, and all the promise of new life became matters of Church sanction and regulation; and religion has henceforth perpetually confused moral and doctrinal issues.

Maintaining the reality of moral conflict in the soul of Jesus, as inseparable from the recognition of his full humanity, and as essential to the relation in which he stands, as a man, and not merely as a teacher, to the men of our day, M. Réville says a few words on a matter to which attention has been called of late by the diffusion of the Ritschlian doctrine of the communion of the Christian with Christ:—

> In the Gospel, it is the very soul of the Christ which reveals itself to us and speaks to us, in such way that there is certainly more of spiritual relation between one who is a disciple of the Gospel in spirit and in truth, in our own day, than there is between the same disciple and the great majority of his contemporaries. The spiritual personal communion of the Christian with the Christ is therefore perfectly legitimate, and it is often the case that this form of Christian piety . . . responds to religious needs that gain no satisfaction from piety of a harder and more rationalistic type. It is as great a mistake to make to impose this as essential to Christian life . . . as it is to treat it as superstition pure and simple, and to liken it to the materialistic cult of the Sacred Heart, as people are too much inclined to do in the world of free thought, not considering the serious and profound reasons which justify, for the psychologist, this mystical communion of Christ and Christians. Each must follow his own inspiration in this matter. It is in the very variety of those personal presentments and emotions that the vitality of a religion shows itself. The only limitation which, according to Liberal Protestants, a loyal study of the Gospels must impose, is that you shall not allow yourselves to be induced by mysticism to direct towards this human Christ the worship and adoration which belong to God alone. Such an attitude is neither Protestant, nor conformable to the teaching of the Christ himself. . . . Christolatry, that product of the invasion of primitive Christianity by Greek paganism, is the very negation of the pure monotheism of the Gospel. (P. 108.)

* "Le Protestantisme Libéral: ses Origines, sa Nature, sa Mission. Par Jean Réville, Professeur adjoint à la Faculté de théologie protestante de l'Université de Paris. Paris: Librairie Fischbacher, 1903.

We have left ourselves too little space for dealing with the contents of the two remaining lectures. The fourth is devoted to the idea and work of a Liberal Church —a liberal National Church, without State dictation in matters theological, is the object of our author's aspiration. The continued and even enhanced importance of public worship, the enlargement of its function and the varying of its interest, and above all the religious instruction of the young, are, as he eloquently pleads, matters deserving the most earnest consideration. He draws a picture of the general result, as seen in Catholic countries (and we might add, not infrequently in England also), of detachment from sacerdotalism and dogmatism, when no further step is taken towards a consistent religious position; the husband becomes a freethinker, the wife vacillates till the old way, as the only one she knows, appears to be the only thing for the children. Isolation and indifference can only give the victory to sacerdotalism and dogmatism again. "All the negation of the eighteenth century in Catholic countries resulted in—what? In rendering the sacerdotal Church stronger than ever in the nineteenth." And in the fifth lecture, "The Mission of Liberal Protestantism in Modern Society," M. Réville emphasises the same observation in a striking passage:—

Historic experience enables us to affirm that it has never yet been possible to destroy religious institutions or beliefs that have once taken root in society — however scandalous their representatives, however erroneous their doctrines—without substituting for them other institutions or other principles, of a kind to give satisfaction to the religious needs of the human soul. The irreligious freethinkers who imagine in our day that they have made short work of the Church with its irrational traditions, its superstitious practices, and its insupportable despotism, when they have suppressed religious teaching and run a pen through the name of God in children's lesson books, are victims of a singular illusion! Alas, we have seen this before and we shall see it again. The very men who to-day vote the suppression of God will go back to mass to-morrow—nay, even to-day a good number of them are contriving to entrust the moral education of their children to those same representatives of orthodox tradition whose necessary suppression they do not cease to decree. (P. 160.)

Thus far we have been more than content to follow the cheerful and inspiring thoughts of this eloquent prophet of liberal religion, with hardly a thought of criticising even an expression. But we cannot help noting two passages in the last lecture in which the cheerfulness of faith seem to undergo sudden and unexpected eclipse. In the first, M. Réville speaks of the hope of eternal life as "the necessary crown of our miserable existence here below," and expresses in a note his conviction that "without the future life, existence here below is but a sinister comedy," and that "it can have no moral character if, for us, all is over at death." It appears to us that the life of men need not be miserable, that they may apprehend and serve a moral order, they may know and do the Will of God, nay, even rejoice in the Lord alway, not only without any certainty of a future life, but even without any such expectation of it as consciously influences thought, motive, or purpose. We have much sympathy with old Bishop Davenant, who, like a staunch Calvinist as he was, rebutted the allegation that the Gospel was no good to a man who had no assurance of salvation, by the argument that it was a great thing for him, if he were going to be damned, to know the Gospel, and walk in its light, and comport himself like a Christian and a gentleman in this life. As to the miseries of life, how often has the comforting doctrine that Heaven pays for all been used as a screen for human indifference! How often has the religious world been really surprised to learn how many of man's miseries are remediable by man!

The second passage on which we are disposed to comment seems to present another case of what strikes us as undue attenuation of what we conceive to be natural ethical sentiment. M. Réville, having in the second lecture defined Religion as being in its essence the sentiment of a living relation between the human individual and the powers or power of which the universe is the manifestation, and, as we have seen, indicated this relation as primarily one of conscious dependence, is disposed to plead that the truly religious sentiment is in our day constantly ignored or belittled at the bidding of the sentiment of humanity. Christianity is mutilated when the love of man is divorced from the love of God. So far, we heartily agree; but at this point his argument seems to leave us behind. Lest we should be guilty of unsympathetic abbreviation, we quote the passage in full:—

It is very just to appeal to solidarity; we have sufficiently emphasised its dominating influence in the moral life of man and of society. But when people attempt to base the whole moral life on the consciousness of the debt we owe humanity, they forget that this debt in no way constitutes a moral obligation. We owe everything to the toil of the generations before us, and we are caught in the complicated network of modern social solidarity. True, but the former generations did not toil with any eye to us, and in our day each individual, in discharging his social function, is working to satisfy his own needs, not to serve me. With regard to our contemporaries, solidarity reduces itself to simple division of labour. With regard to the past, we are not bound to any grateful recognition. We benefit by its work only through the fact—fact independent of any will on its part—that in the universal linkage of causes and effects, we are born in this particular portion of space and time. Other men are our equals; we are their debtors as they are ours. Between us and them there is simply exchange of services. On this base alone one cannot found the moral life. This finds its solid foundation only in the sentiment of our absolute dependence in regard to the universal order. To it we owe all. It owes us nothing. There lies the foundation of religion and morality, so indissolubly connected in the depths of the human soul: there is the principle of moral obligation, the source of energy, the power of beneficent resignation and of glad and trustful activity. The noblest and strongest races have been those which have had the most lively sentiment of this inner assurance. It is ours, according to the Gospel, to love God in man and man in God. (P. 173.)

The conclusion is admirable, but we do not quite follow the course by which it is reached.

We are talking of sentiments, of the sources of motive in feelings. We agree that if anybody does really take the view of humanity, past and present, that is here laid before us, there is no feeling about it, and no morality in it. If in regarding the common life of man, the only solidarity of which you are conscious is that of economic interdependence, the result in your mind is no more ethical than political economy is ethical. And, we are disposed to add, if in regarding the Supreme Being the only relation of which you are conscious is that of absolute dependence on the universal order, the result in your soul may not be the Love of God—it may be a cool fortitude; it may be a selfish fatalism; we cannot predicate that by any process, instinctive or logical, it will be such as to transform and exalt your view of man, to touch it with emotion, and inspire it with an energy of self-sacrifice. Religion, and the morals that are to feel its inspiration and share its life, must have a personal element. Do we abstract men and women into Humanity and try to use a cosmical generalisation as a synonym for God? We venture to say, for ourselves, that only as Humanity again takes flesh as man and woman and child, and God draws near to our hearts and interprets our little portion of the world-process in the light of His love, does our relation to man and to God assume the Christian character of cheerful service and patient trust.

We expressed, a fortnight ago, our delight in receiving a new volume of sermons by Dr. Martineau, which was all the keener because we had not known until quite recently that such a volume was possible. It is natural to look wistfully at the remaining manuscripts of a departed teacher, whose word has been rich in wisdom and inspiration, even when, as in the case of Dr. Martineau, his long life has been brought to such beautiful completeness, and he himself was enabled to bring out a remarkable series of works, including a collected edition of the essays and addresses which, in his judgment, it was well to republish. Surely, one thinks, there must be much more that is precious, even though he himself did not choose it out as the best of all for publication, which yet we should be thankful to possess. That is a very natural feeling, and we are thankful indeed that the Misses Martineau have allowed us to share in these selections from the larger store of sermons which their father left to them. And yet after a careful perusal of this volume we are conscious of a feeling that one ought not to be too eager to possess all, and that in giving free way to such a natural longing one might, perhaps, be doing injury rather than honour to a great mind. There is nothing in this volume that we are not most thankful to have. Every one of the sermons is stamped unmistakably by the writer's genius, and they are rich in memorable passages; yet we turn again to the "Endeavours" and the "Hours of Thought," and the impression is irresistible, "These are richer and more perfect. It was by a sure instinct that he himself chose out the most perfect of these 'lyric' utterances of his soul. Shall we not, perhaps, do better to follow this guidance of his judgment, and, rather than look for others, let these illuminating and inspiring words speak again and again to our souls?"

* "National Duties, and Other Sermons and Addresses." By James Martineau. (Longmans, Green and Co. 6s. net.)

The new volume is of the greatest interest from the biographical point of view. The twenty-two sermons are all dated, and twice dated, as having been preached both in Liverpool and London. Still more interesting would it be to the biographer to see the actual manuscripts, and so to know what revisions were made in sermons preached at intervals ranging in length from ten to more than thirty years.

The first six of the sermons, grouped together under the general title "National Duties," were first preached in Hope-street Church during the Crimean War, but repeated later at various times in Little Portland-street Chapel. The first two sermons, on "The Ground of National Unity," are dated 1854, and it s interesting to find a good part of the first of these, and a passage from the fourth of the series, used by Dr. Martineau in the first of the Political Essays included in his collection, the essay on "International Duties and the Present Crisis," which first appeared in the National Review for July, 1855. In these sermons there is no mistaking the preacher's attitude as to the connection between politics and religion. "The State," he says, "is the corporate expression of a people's mind; there is no reason whatever for permitting its material self-interest to speak in legislation, and leaving its moral convictions and higher sentiments to remain the accidents of individuals, private and unorganised." And again, in the fourth sermon on "The Mutual Duties of Nations":—

> The doctrine that truth, honour, and magnanimity are good only for private life, and have no place in the intercourse of nations; that self-interest is the single aim, and chicanery and violence the allowable means, of action in the State; that history can be summoned before no moral tribunal, but must have a character of its own entitled to brand the noble and justify the guilty; is the creed, however common, of a shameless atheism which believes in force and ends in tyranny. Between State and State, as between person and person, the right and true has eternal obligation, which no human vote created, and no human vote annuls. It is in vain that men in their lax tolerance and affected wisdom pretend to slur a public crime or canonize mendacious promises; God abides the same, and only waits the proper hour to show himself inexorably just; the false race withers from the root, and proves to be no perennial in the field of time. (P. 48.)

Of these six sermons we can well believe that the last especially, on "The Right of War," was received by no means with universal assent by Dr. Martineau's hearers. Its uncompromising vindication of war as an instrument of Divine providence, calling out the noblest qualities in national life, and its somewhat contemptuous reference to commerce as rooted merely in self-interest, would not carry conviction to men of "Peace" principles or those who found in co-operation the true ideal of unselfish service.

The sermons on National Duties are followed by another group, on various aspects of religious faith. The first of these, on "The Sphere and Spirit of Faith," preached in Liverpool in 1845, might be said to contain in germ the main doctrine of the "Seat of Authority in Religion," laying stress on the need of direct inward experience of the great facts of the religious life, and of trust in the reality of such experience. The conclusion of the sermon points to the actual character of the revelation that we find in Christ.

> It has been well and truly said, that any man may readily make himself an atheist, by simple neglect of things divine. Selfish affections, impure imagination, relaxed or abandoned duties, will speedily penetrate the whole nature with the canker of unbelief, and leave it to sink into bottomless depths of a reprobate mind. And so it is impossible to divest religion of its moral character; a devout trust shows a heart that habitually commences with its own highest, and approaches its own God. As to external aids to the attainment of this state of mind, there is but one of deep and almost resistless efficacy; the presence of a soul filled with like absolute trust and living a divine life which glorifies all earthly things. Place me beside a brother man of high capacious spirit, and let me watch his uplifted eye, and overhear his low-breathed prayer, and I cannot but catch the influence of a temper so lofty and holy; and instantly I not only love what he loves, but by an ineffable agency I believe what he believes, and assimilate my poorer nature to his. And if faith only can awaken faith, then Christ, who has so perfected it in us, must be its supreme example in himself. His inspiration was not one of knowledge to the intellect (which were paltry in comparison), but of spiritual insight to the soul. He occupied the region unknown to the perceptions of us all, with a moral perfection never conceived of before. He created a higher highest, and so revealed a truer God. There can be no other revelation that deserves to be called Religion. And though otherwise he might give us information, thus only could he become the Author and Perfecter of Faith. (P. 101.)

There are also sermons of exposition, such as those on "The Unjust Steward," "Christ's Definition of 'Neighbour,'" and "The Religion of Assurance and the Religion of Desire" (on the Pharisee and Publican of the Parable). These are among the earliest of the sermons, and there is one even from 1832, the first year of Dr. Martineau's ministry in Liverpool, that on "The Moral Power of Christianity Evinced in its Corruptions," preached again in London in the year before his final retirement from the pulpit. On these and other of the sermons, as those on "Christian Self-Reverence" and "The Ascension," we should have been glad to dwell, but must forbear, and merely add that in all these sermons there are so many passages which ought not to be forgotten, that we cannot help hoping, even if no more volumes of complete sermons should be published, that the remaining manuscripts may produce a rich harvest of such memorable passages, which would be a treasure of the highest worth.

It was mentioned in our former article that besides the sermons this volume contains a number of addresses at special services. In the nine Valedictory Addresses, Dr. Martineau is brought once more very near to his old students, while the Communion Addresses reveal the very heart of his Christian discipleship. In one of the Christening Addresses there is a passage of special helpfulness, which we quote as a companion to that above given from the sermon on "The Sphere and Spirit of Faith." The Christening Service is dated 1861:—

> To parents touched with Christian humility and love, there is no more natural desire than that their children should be better than themselves. Yet how can dependent minds be lifted upwards but by the attraction of a higher spirit? how pass beyond the level which is their measure day by day? Must we indeed be content if they repeat our poor selves, and renew for the world the image which so disappoints our secret heart? Blessed be God, there is no need thus to flatten the best inspiration of every worthy home. The child is formed, not merely by what the parents have attained to be, but also by what they visibly aspire to be; not by the scale of their outward life alone, but by the measure of their inward worship—by the tone of their love, the colour of their hope, the uplifted look of their whole being. This it is that reveals, more speakingly than any words, a higher than themselves, on whom they also depend, as the child on them; that opens, though in shadowy visions, the steps of an ascending holiness which nowhere ends, from earth to heaven. (P. 360.)

Last of all comes an "Address to a Congregation on Induction of a New Minister." It is dated 1864, at Bolton, and is therefore the address given at the induction of the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, who succeeded to the Bank-street pulpit on the retirement of the Rev. Franklin Baker after a ministry of forty years. And indeed the address opens with a direct reference to that fact, for Dr. Martineau speaks of his own remembrance of that earlier induction when he himself was a youth of nineteen, still at college at York. Referring to the counsels and the prayers offered on that occasion, he says:—

> Pondering them deeply, under the broken lights of an unripe judgment and a heart on fire, I remember a certain youthful disappointment at their sober colouring—a secret wonder whether the Kingdom of God came so much by observation of what men might expect from themselves and from one another; a longing to believe in some ministry of the spirit which should snatch us from self-distrust and self-reliance, and make us organs of diviner power.

What follows must be read in the book itself, and indeed the whole address is to be earnestly commended to the attention of ministers and congregations alike. If some of the sermons furnish ground for questioning, this and the preceding addresses are among the most quickening things that we possess, and of the volume as a whole our final word must be of unqualified thankfulness.*

* On the title-page another degree, Litt. D Dubl, should be added to Dr. Martineau's name.

HAWTHORNE AND MARTINEAU.

There is more kinship in the work of Nathaniel Hawthorne and James Martineau than appears on the surface. Martineau wrote positive and critical philosophy: Hawthorne wrote sketches and stories. Both were masters of English prose and excelled in the power of lucid expression, while each used language suitable to his own method.

The deeper kinship of their work is, however, this, that each was engaged in sifting out and preserving the true and permanent wealth of moral and religious meaning from the dogmas, extravagances, and literalism that had embedded them.

Martineau's mind and character were of the Puritan or Stoical type, but he never shut himself within his theories, nor made his own interpretations of righteousness the final test of other people's actions. Thus the harshness and want of sympathy characteristic of that type was not in him. Truth led him; and his own prejudices had to go like chaff before the wind whenever the fresh air blew upon them. He was always open to the sun and the storm, the tempest and the calm. The whole of life's vicissitudes and discoveries being met by him, not in the spirit of distrust and fear, but with the expectation that truth was best and must at any rate be secured wherever possible, the sterling Puritan morality was winnowed of its chaff, and moral principle and religious faith were set upon foundations that were reliable.

Hawthorne by his stories did the same thing. The Puritan prejudice, narrowness, superstition and bibliolatry were quietly deposed and a sweeter and tenderer humanity expressed. The development of New England life was helped, and with it that of the world, from the straitness, strictness, and plainness of the austere godliness of the early settlers to a gentler and more winning humanity and trustfulness without losing hold on essential principles. The danger always is that extravagance of asceticism and strictly defined outward expression of religion and morality should produce hypocrisy and rebellion. As Martineau in the philosophic field, so Hawthorne in that of fiction, seized upon the essential truth underlying old and passing doctrine. From the outward to the inward meaning is his method, and the insistence on correspondence between the expression and the meaning.

"The Scarlet Letter," if not the greatest, is perhaps the most popular of Hawthorne's books. It is a story of conscience, real conscience, not any formal substitute for it, the truth of the Puritan character, not its outward legalism. Conscience is an essential principle with Hawthorne as with Martineau, intuitional, unresolvable into anything else except God. "Transformation" with wonderful delicacy suggests and develops a story of the Fall, a re-reading of Genesis, the suitable text or motto for which was written at a later date by Robert Browning—"We fall to rise," and brings the best elements of Puritanism into agreement with the scientific doctrine of Evolution. The Fall is the awakening of conscience. Here again the two men did the same work, building on good solid earth, or the solidest they could find, when the old building, which did for a while, had become shaky. The world had not lived on a lie, but the truth was not dependent on the props men imagined to be its support.

Martineau and Hawthorne both found bed-rock for moral and religious conviction in conscience, and perceived that men's struggles and sins were a part of the growth from animal un-morality towards divine communion and peacefulness. This is where the two agree in teachings essentially the same.

It is reassuring, and characteristic of their principles and their devotion to them, that the literary work of each is so perfect in form, without signs of haste or the slightest indication of slovenliness. One may truly say it is conscientious to a quite unusual extent.

A certain shy reserve was also characteristic of both men, and prevented them from being personally popular, but did not prevent them from being loved, honoured, and revered.

The wealth of Dr. Martineau's affections is hardly indicated in the recently published memoirs. The personal and family life of Hawthorne are delightfully pictured in "Memories of Hawthorne," by Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, which, however, consists largely of Mrs. Hawthorne's diaries and letters.

It is interesting to notice what Sophia Hawthorne wrote about Martineau, whom she met during the time of his residence in Liverpool.*

> Yesterday, who should come to see me but Mr. James Martineau and his wife! I have the greatest admiration for him as a divine, and I do not know what I expected to see in the outward man. But I was well pleased with his aspect as I found it. He is not tall, and he is pale, though not thin, with the most perfectly simple manners and beautiful expression. It seemed as if he had always been my brother; as if I could find in him counsellor, friend, saint, and sage; and I have no doubt it is so. so potent is the aroma of character without a word or sign. How worse than folly it is to imagine that character can either be cried up or cried down! No veil can conceal, no blazonry exalt, either the good or the evil. A man has only to come in and sit down, and there he is for better, for worse. I, at least, am always, as it were, hit by a person's sphere; and either the music of the spheres or the contrary supervenes, and sometimes also nothing at all, if there is not much strength of character. Mr. Martineau did not say much; but his voice was very pleasant and sympathetic, and he won regard merely by his manner of being. . . . It was a delightful call; and I feel as if I had friends indeed and in need just from that one interview.

In another passage Mrs. Hawthorne says: "Mr. Martineau has a kind of apostolic dignity about him." Dr. Martineau's remembrance of Nathaniel Hawthorne is expressed in an unpublished letter: "He was a truly delightful companion, with the best charm in him of the new world and the old." Both Hawthorne and Martineau had in them the charm and dignity of the old, while open to the freedom and light of the new; and their life work was to show the continuity of good from the old to the new.

Priestley Prime.

* Hawthorne, who was nine months older than Martineau, and a fellow-student of Longfellow's at Bowdoin, was American Consul in Liverpool from 1853 to 1857, when he moved to Rome. Thus Hawthorne and Martineau left Liverpool in the same year.

AN OCTOGENARIAN'S TRIBUTE TO DR. MARTINEAU.

Here Eld on utmost Eld expends its store,
And eighty homage yields to ninety-four.

So wrote Mr. Thomas Hornblower Gill four years ago, in the last of his birthday greetings to Dr. Martineau, which were gathered up in our Memorial number. Now at eighty-four Mr. Gill retains with unabated force the admirations and loyalties of his fervent youth, and he has been good enough to write down for us the following interesting reminiscences and words of tribute, which we gladly publish this week, mindful of the anniversary of April 21.

To most of our readers Mr. Gill will be best known as the author of some of the noblest of our modern hymns, eleven of which are in Martineau's Hymns of Praise and Prayer and others in the Essex Hall Hymnal. He is also the biographer of Franklin Howorth, who was a fellow-student of Martineau's at York, and in addition to "The Golden Chain of Praise" and other poetry is the author of an eloquent historical work, "The Papal Drama."

His host in Liverpool, mentioned below, whom Mr. Gill visited every year from 1839 to 1847, was Francis Hornblower, who married Jane, the second daughter of Roscoe, the historian. These are Mr. Gill's reminiscences:—

Memory is a mighty power and often a delightful minister. I found it potent in bringing the realm of History under my dominion and in recalling the gifts and virtues of departed friends. It lingers over my long acquaintance with Dr Martineau, recalls the early rise, and rejoices in the continuous advance of my admiration—an acquaintance exceeding in length that of almost all his living admirers.

In 1839 I perused his lectures at the Liverpool controversy, so full of lofty thought and splendid rhetoric. In 1840 I listened with delight at Liverpool to his sermon on the introduction of his first hymn-book.* In 1842 I enjoyed his company and delighted in his discourses at Liverpool. I sent him a copy of my first published work, "The Fortunes of Faith," a long and elaborate poem, and in 1843 gladly took my place among the invited purchasers of the first volume of the "Endeavours." In 1844 my enjoyment of his converse and sermons was repeated and increased. I recognised and proclaimed his pre-eminence long before it was generally acknowledged and while he remained somewhat unpopular among strict Priestleyan Unitarians, before whom I frequently asserted it. During his stay at the Lakes in 1847 at his request I occupied his pulpit for two Sundays.

My visits to Liverpool ceased on the departure of my host therefrom, and for many years my intercourse with Dr. Martineau was limited to the perusal of his works. But my residence near London since 1866 was gladdened by frequent intercourse, both colloquial and epistolary.

During the last few years of his life I

* The sermon on "The Communion of Saints," afterwards published in the first volume of the "Endeavours after the Christian Life," and preached in Paradise-street Chapel, Nov. 1, 1840, when the congregation used "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home" for the first time.

greeted his birthday once in Latin and five times in English verse. In one of those greetings I spoke of him as "the matchless master-mind" of our age. The oftener I think of him the more fully I revere in him the greatest intellect and the sublimest soul of the nineteenth century.

Two circumstances connected with Dr. Martineau are especially remarkable, the two-fold Protestantism of his descent and the great length of his life. I hold an unbroken Protestant descent to be a great blessing, rejoice exceedingly in our Puritan forefathers. Our spirit is the offspring of their spirit, their inner life and longings we inherit. The descendant of French Huguenots and English Puritans inherited their richest gifts and loftiest aspirations. Dr. Martineau died in his ninety-fifth year. I cannot call to mind throughout the ages any transcendent thinker or writer who lived so long. Exceeded in age by the Athenian Isocrates and the French Fontenelle, who died in his hundredth year, he surpassed them both in greatness of intellect, in splendour of style and in sublimity of soul. What transcendent genius ever had so lengthened a career here below? What long dweller on earth so vividly contemplated, so earnestly aspired after the life of Heaven as did James Martineau?

Thomas Hornblower Gill.

THE DAWN BIRD.

There is one unseen sweetest bird, whose trill
Greets each spring morn the day but just begun,
When light proclaims the coming of the sun,
Before he rises o'er the eastern hill.
'Tis scarce a song; its full melodious rill
Pours out upon the air so soft and low,
E'en as some great content will overflow
From out a heart by thankfulness made still,
And murmurs of deep joy the silence fill,
Of sacred joy, too rich for loud acclaim.
The night is o'er; the bird I cannot name
Feels in her breast the wakened morning's thrill.
Winter was bare, yet now the flowers are springing;
Mourning may last the night, but with the dawn comes singing.

SHORT NOTICES.

Mrs. Hamilton's translation of Gregorovius' great work on the City of Rome in the Middle Ages has made English readers more familiar with the name of the German historian. We are glad to call attention to what may in some respects be regarded as a supplemental volume. It is a translation by Miss Dorothea Roberts of some of his travel sketches in Italy (Latian Summers and an Excursion in Umbria, pp. x. 364). The essays were written about forty years ago, and some of the conditions which they describe, like the Papal prison and soldiery at Pagliano, have since disappeared. They are marked by all the attractive features of Gregorovius' work, his keen eye for picturesque effects, his love for architecture, and his admirable descriptive power. The volume opens with a delightful account of the Benedictine Monastery at Subiaco, and this is followed by a long narrative of wanderings in the Campagna which should be read by all visitors to Rome. It is, however, for its descriptions of remote and half-forgotten towns, like Todi and Aspra, the former the birth-place of the Franciscan poet Jacopone, that it has a special claim upon our attention. We can recommend it cordially to all who love to wander in Italian by-ways.

Many friends will be grateful for the Memorials of Robert Spears, 1825–1899, which, together with an admirable portrait and a biographical sketch by Mr. S. Charlesworth, gather up many pleasant reminiscences of a devoted and strenuous life, and the warm tributes of such friends as Dr. Courtney Kenny and the Rev. Alexander Gordon. The preface is a warm-hearted tribute from Robert Collyer, who writes of their first meeting in 1865 at Stamford-street Chapel:—"I found Robert was sincere as the daylight, wholesome as good brown bread, and, as we say over here, 'a man to tie to and to love.'" And of some later holiday rambles Mr. Collyer writes:—"These memories are delightful—he was such a good fellow and a good comrade when he was out of harness, so full of joy and all pleasantness. Only he would put two days' travel into one." Among all the work he did as an ardent preacher of Unitarian Christianity the most notable and widely beneficent was, perhaps, in the various editions of Channing's collected works which he was enabled to publish. (Belfast: Ulster Unitarian Christian Association. 1s. net.)

Matthew Henry and His Chapel, 1662–1900, by H. D. Roberts, we warmly commended at the time of its first publication as a valuable contribution to the history of early Nonconformist days, and we are very glad that the work is now re-issued at half the original cost. It is the same book, with all its admirable illustrations, only with the edges cut and in a new binding. (Liverpool: Booksellers' Co., 70, Lord-street. 2s. 6d. net.)

The interesting address on The Story of Salters' Hall, by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., delivered last October at the opening meeting of the High Pavement Historical Society, Nottingham, has been printed, and copies (6d.) may be had from the Secretary of the Society, Mr. Walter E. Evans, High Lea, Foxhall-road, Nottingham.

The Parables of Jesus and their Message To-day, by W. Tudor Jones, contains five addresses to young people, four of which appeared in the Christian Freeman. They suggest thoughts that will be helpful in the study of the Parables. (Swansea: A. Davies, 30, New Oxford-street. 6d. net.)

The Rev. J. L. Haigh's Service of Song, The Story of Joseph, does not come as an untried novelty into our hands. The story is told in blank verse, and the hymns, both words and music, are in keeping with the earnest tone of the whole. The Sunday School Association has now issued the Service in admirable form. (S.S.A., Essex Hall. 4d. net.)

The International Quarterly, edited by Mr. F. A. Richardson, is a substantial volume, true to its name. The number for March—June opens with an article on "Christianity and Buddhism," by Professor Rhys Davids, and among other subjects dealt with are "Development of the French Drama," "Lessons from Dutch Colonisation," "B. Björnson," and "Tendencies in Modern German Sculpture." Professor Josiah Royce has an article on "The Problem of Natural Religion." (Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

MORE FIRESIDE FABLES.

I. The Four Stations.

A pilgrim on his way prayed, first, not to die; then, not to live; then, so to live each day, as one day to die; and, at last, so daily to die, as each day to live.

II. Unawares.

Three children were told that, if they walked three miles, they might perhaps see three angels. When they had passed the last milestone, they met an old man, and to him they complained that they had seen not one on the way.

"What did you see?"

"By the first stone we saw a wounded bird, with its head under its wing."

"That was the angel Sleep. What did you then?"

"We carried it for a mile, and then it breathed no more."

"That was the angel Death. Saw you nothing else?"

"We looked up and, lo, the mother-bird had followed all the while."

"That was the angel Love. You have seen three on the way."

III. The Grass of the Field.

Of three fair lilies, one was held in the hand and studied, and one was set in a vase and admired, and one lay on a grave and withered, and, of the three, not one was "considered."

IV. Abstract and Concrete.

A little Indian boy, grinding corn, called upon Earth and Air and Fire and Water to help him, but they gave him no answer. When the corn was ground, he mixed it with water, and cooked it with fire in an earthen pot, and cooled it with the breath of his mouth, and still thought that his prayer was unanswered.

V. Hope.

A prisoner looked for some sign of hope, and found it in the dawn, and then in an opening bud, but soon he remembered that out of yesterday's dawn had come the night, and out of last year's bud the dry leaf. Hope next appeared in the evening star, but before long flickered, and sank with the sun. There was now only light enough to read how it was said: "Hope that is seen is not hope," and then he discovered that hope also was a prisoner, locked up in his breast, but alive.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

Twenty-one years ago the National Conference of the Members and Friends of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-subscribing or Kindred Congregations met for the first time in Liverpool, inaugurating a movement which has been of the greatest benefit to the common life of our religious fellowship, and it is a happy circumstance that the Conference should now celebrate its majority in the city of its birth. To speak of its majority is not merely to use a figure of speech. Baptised of the Spirit, it was indeed consecrated from the first to a noble purpose, strengthening the bonds of religious fellowship in a people too little apt to realise their unity in one common life and work, giving impulse in wise counsel and brotherly fellowship to fresh enterprise in devoted efforts. Great things have been already done. The first year saw the creation of the Sustentation Fund, and since the last Triennial meeting the Pensions Fund has also been established. These are the two most signal instances of practical initiative, and thus the Conference has proved its strength, and is ready to enter upon the wider services of a mature manhood. We shall not anticipate here the discussion of momentous questions, which is to take place at the business meeting, but what we earnestly hope is that ministers and delegates will come together under a full sense of the responsibility which rests upon them, to further the effectiveness of the common life of our Churches. The District Associations may do much, if properly supported, to strengthen the religious life of their constituent churches, and to extend the influence of a free spiritual faith throughout the community; and their natural centre of unity, from which the inspiration of the whole body should go forth for the quickening of every member, is the National Conference. But the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is already in the field, and through long experience has acquired great practical capacity in the work of helping the churches, and has won the widespread confidence of our community. If further progress is to be made, the respective functions of these two societies must be clearly defined, so that the energies of our whole people may be concentrated on the wisest efforts, and our work may be done in that strength, which is happiest and most effective where there is unity of spirit and the bond of peace.

What the immediate result of the coming discussions may be we do not venture to predict, but are happy to believe that whatever decision is arrived at the meetings of the Conference will not fail of that best stimulus which arises from such a gathering of friends and brethren devoted to a common cause. The hospitality of Liverpool is proverbial, and generous provision has been made to secure the happiest conditions for these great gatherings. Of foreign delegates, we are delighted to hear that Professor Jean Réville of Paris, and Professor C. H. Toy of Harvard are to be welcomed. The service on Tuesday evening, in the Philharmonic Hall, when the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, President of the Conference, is to be the preacher, cannot fail to bring with it the true inspiration. Twenty-one years ago, in that same place, it will be remembered, the late Charles Beard was the preacher. After the Communion Service in Hope-street Church on Wednesday morning, no more fitting paper could have been provided than that by Dr. John Hunter, "A Plea for a Worshipful Church," on which there is to be no discussion. Dr. Hunter, as many of our readers are aware, is minister of the King's Weigh House Congregational Church in London, and we need not bespeak for him the most cordial welcome to our Conference. Of the subjects for discussion "The Pastoral Ideal" and "Our Obligations in Social Work" deal with direct issues of practical faithfulness, while the Rev. Joseph Wood's paper on "Church Needs and Conference Ideals" will doubtless open up for consideration matters which to some extent at least are to be practically dealt with at the business meeting on the afternoon of the same day. The final paper, which like the first, will be read without discussion, is by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, on "The Doctrine of Forgiveness and the Law of Reconciliation: a Study of Human Experience in the Life of the Spirit."

The meetings in Liverpool will recall many memories of twenty-one years ago; not only of Charles Beard, the preacher, but of William Rathbone, who seconded the resolution following on Mr. Rawson's paper, out of which arose the Sustentation Fund, of Dr. Crosskey, one of the first secretaries of the Conference, of Charles Perry, minister of Hope-street Church, who gave devoted service to the Conference as local secretary, and many others who have since passed beyond the veil. Of those who were present with their brethren only in spirit we remember above all Dr. Martineau, bound to Liverpool by ties of the closest affection, whose letter to the Conference (the chief parts of it) we have once more reprinted here. Six years later he was present at the Conference at Leeds, and gave his great address, with proposals for the better organisation of our Churches. His elaborate scheme was not accepted, and yet it has borne good fruit. Something has been done towards closer co-operation, and the sense of obligation in mutual helpfulness has undoubtedly been deepened. Tuesday next, when the Conference again meets in Liverpool, is his birthday, and two years hence on that day will come the celebration of his centenary. May it be in his spirit, the spirit of lowly Christian discipleship, quickened by the inspiration of his memory, loyal to the great principles to which he gave his life, that the representatives of our Free Churches come together next week for Conference!

DR. MARTINEAU'S LETTER TO THE FIRST LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE, 1882.

The main portions of this letter we reprinted three years ago, before the meeting of the Conference at Leicester, but meeting again in Liverpool it is fitting that these weighty words should again be brought to the attention of the members of the Conference.

"At a crisis when many heads are dizzied and many hearts alarmed by the rapid changes in thought and in society, it may not be out of place for a veteran, himself not unaffected by them, to avow his unabated confidence in the Christian Congregation as the most beneficent of human institutions—the best guardian of the sanctities of life and the asylum of its sweetest affections. Among those who are alienated from it there are doubtless some who may sustain themselves in a higher atmosphere, and many who intellectually occupy a level above its average teaching. But, on a wide comparison of the population within the churches and that without, the former, I am persuaded, will be found to contain, in spite of its minority, by far the greater part of the conscience, the humanity, the purity, the nobleness, which are the cement of society and the backbone of national character.

"When I look at any choice example of this institution, and ask myself what have been the real springs of its power, I find them in three conditions:

> "(1) That its members unite purely for Fellowship and Growth in the Christian life and mind.
> "(2) That, in its external action, it bears down with Missionary zeal on the Paganism and irreligion and neglected suffering which it sees around.

"(2) That on other Churches it looks as on confederates, moving upon different lines in the same sacred warfare.

So that these three—namely, Sympathies of Godliness within the congregation; Aggression on Sin and misery without; Loyal Affection for comrades under other banners—are the animating principles which make even a small Christian Society a leaven of moral health to a neighbourhood ten times its size.

"The first condition embraces two aims, of Fellowship in the Christian mind, and Growth in it. Among persons various in age and position these two are unequally felt, and for their furtherance should resort, I think, each to his own methods. All the Public Services are the proper medium and aliment of Fellowship; while for Growth provision should be made by Special Classes and Fraternities, which each member may accept or decline. The people as a whole need a kindling voice to interpret and deepen their common trusts and settled affections; the minister, as an individual, needs scope for fresh convictions of duty and lights of thought; and it is not well that either need should be made absolute, to the prejudice of the other. It is indispensable to provide, not only for such training of the young in moral and spiritual truth as may bring them to the Christlike mind, but also for acquainting all willing learners with the present aspects of theological knowledge. But it is one thing to open congregational classes in which the grounds of conflicting opinion may be systematically explained; it is quite another to disappoint an assembly of thirsting souls, that come to drink from the fountain of life, with dry criticisms or philosophical abstractions. And so with respect to current questions of social reform and political obligation—e.g., temperance, war, &c. It is inevitable that every faithful man should make a conscience of his belief upon these things; but he cannot on that account, if he be the head of a society where beliefs and consciences differ, assume more than his individual right of free action and persuasion within the circle that sympathy gathers around him. If in early life I had distinctly conceived the rule here laid down, I should have avoided some mistakes. And I could earnestly wish that my younger brethren might reverence their office, more than I have done, as representing the collective piety of a mixed congregation.

"The second condition assumes, what experience has at last brought home to us, that no Christian Society can subsist upon its own internal relations alone, and, like a monastery, shut out the confusion and the cries of the world around. We acknowledge, with all Christendom, that the Missionary spirit is inseparable from the religious life; and that it is impossible for a people to train themselves in the school of Christ, yet remain quiet neighbours to the victims of passion, ignorance, and wrong. Where there is no sorrow felt for those to whom God is dead, and the heavens are dark, no pity for those whose life is a flight from pursuing Fate into the grim arms of 'the last enemy,' no longing to seek and to save the lost, how can there be either love of God or 'enthusiasm of humanity'? No Christian Society gives any adequate expression of its essential character, unless from its heart goes forth some message of healing and entreaty to its neighbourhood; and it is but a selfish membership that looks coldly on such evangelising work. It ought not to satisfy us that we institute and equip Mission stations in parts of our large towns that need them most. Every visible place of worship needs a character, a significance, a spiritual physiognomy upon the spot. It should be more than brick and stone to the eyes that daily see it. Even from the outside let it look upon the passers-by with a gaze of tender mercy and solemn warning and recovered hope. Our Town Missions would be a doubtful blessing to us, if we made them an excuse for surrendering an essential function of every Christian Church. I remember nothing more cheering in the contemporary history of our churches than the admirable experiments of Mr. Beard in Liverpool, and more recently of Mr. Hopps in Leicester, for extending the circle of religious sympathy to classes that too rarely feel its embrace. From my heart I honour the faith and courage evinced in these efforts, and wonder what we have been about that they have not sooner been born within us, and more widely wakened us to our duty.

"When I speak of the Missionary spirit as a Christian characteristic, I mean the attitude of a religious soul towards an unreligious, of devout faith towards no faith, of clear-visioned conscience towards moral blindness, of a beloved son towards an orphaned outcast; and I do not mean the attitude of one school of theology towards another. The difference of the two relations is surely plain. Where the interval between myself and another is moral and spiritual—where he lives by righteous rule and I by chance passion—where he is strong and calm and bright, and I am neither master of myself nor in the hands of a Divine deliverer—there is at the heart of both a secret consciousness of their real position: he yearns to lift me up; I feel that he is above me: I am prostrate in my weakness before him, and easily persuaded to stretch forth the hand of dependence. My conscience invests him with an authority which silences the vain pretence at equality, and places me with docility at his feet. It is otherwise where the interval is one of mere intellectual judgment as between two thought-out theologies. Each has a self-preference which is without response in the other; and neither has, by natural or Divine right, any Master-function relatively to the other. The presumptive equality between them is perfect; and I can never usefully study and compare them, except with the belief that I have as much to learn as to teach; and that what has sustained the life of many wise and saintly souls cannot be without its hidden store of truth and good. Hence (let me confess) I could never take, and could never approve, a Missionary attitude towards any of the differing Churches of Christendom, or helpfeeling repelled by Missionary approaches on their part. It is easy to avoid such reciprocation of arrogance without lapse into doctrinal reticence or indifference. Let questions of theology and morals be investigated, like all other questions, on pure grounds of evidence, and dealt with, not by the Advocate, but by the Judge; or, if this rule be too severe, let the Advocate's part never be taken except in reply, in order to rectify polemical distortions and restore the balance disturbed by party zeal. In all other cases, the third condition should come unreservedly into play: the various faiths of Christians around us should be treated with deference, as allies in foreign dress. Leave to the schools definitions of doctrine: let Churches address themselves, with one heart though in many tones, to the redemption of human life from guilt and sorrow. In the presence of great duties, under the inspiration of high affections, men are always drawing nearer to one another: in the eagerness of argument and the encounter of clashing beliefs, they are usually parting further from each other; and for one error that is struck down by the blow of controversy, a score will silently vanish because unable to breathe the air of a new age. Either every Church is bound to attempt the conversion of every other, or else all must live together in the harmony of mutual respect, and commit whatever is special in their cause to the arbitrament of time and the widening of thought. We all see Divine things 'through a glass darkly': but sure I am that my doctrines cannot be right unless that Church is dearest to me which is most deeply rooted in the love of God and of richest fruits in the love of man."

THE UNITARIAN PROBLEM IN NEW ENGLAND.

There are many obvious reasons why a liberal and rational faith, as an organised movement, should make very slow progress in England, and occasionally should appear only to mark time. Overshadowing every effort stands the great institution that identifies itself with the State, the history of which is inextricably interwoven with that of the national life, and which, with its imposing cathedrals and churches, its time-honoured traditions, its attractive ritual and social prestige, makes an appeal to the Englishman which no other religious body can emulate.

Most of us have probably speculated at times as to what would be the result if, instead of beginning the race handicapped, "our little Israel" could start on at least level terms with its competitors. If there were no State Church, if there were no grand legacy of cathedrals and traditions for any sect, if a man might think what he liked and say it absolutely without disfavour—if every Church lived but by its own power of appeal, which it could make without let or hindrance—would everything be different with us? Would liberal religion win an assured ascendancy over the dogmas and creeds of orthodoxy?

An Open Field.

Now, in certain parts of America these conditions are largely fulfilled. America has no State Church. There the Episcopalian institution takes its stand with the rest simply as a sect. In New England, at least, there is no general standard of religious opinion to which it is wise to conform. The fact that he is a Unitarian will not affect any of the relationships of a man's life adversely. He may proclaim himself openly, and no one will be shocked. As regards tradition there is at least as much on his side as against him. The old parish churches in the various towns are more often Unitarian than not—the result of their being founded with an open trust—and it is rarely that his social position would be advanced by becoming a member of any other Church. This is not the case in all parts of America, but it is the case in New England.

The Facts in New England.

Here then is the soil in which we should expect Unitarianism to flourish and reveal its full power. How stands the matter? The visitor to New England is of course immediately struck by the number and the influence of the churches that bear the Unitarian name. In Boston and its neighbourhood in particular the movement, under many a distinguished leader and exponent, has attained a position in the community which has no parallel elsewhere. Here then the expected has happened. The good soil has brought forth fruit sixty-fold and a hundred-fold. And the visitor is apt hurriedly to conclude that the seed is all right, and that everything manifestly depends on the soil. But a study of the development of recent years sheds a new and somewhat unexpected light on the question. Statistics show that the Unitarian denomination has after all remained practically stationary during the last three decades, whilst many of the orthodox bodies have made rapid strides—and this in the New England States. Comparing the returns of thirty years ago with those of to-day, we find that in 1872 there were in the whole of America 347 Unitarian churches, whilst to-day there are 460. This is an increase of 113, or 32 per cent., which is highly satisfactory. But note the following analysis:—In 1872 the 347 churches were divided thus—231 in New England, and 116 in the rest of America. In 1902 of the 460 churches, 258 are in New England, and 202 outside. The growth thus has been 27 in New England, and 86, or about 75 per cent., in the other States. We ought really to make a deduction from the additional 27 in New England, for 9 of these are only new summer churches—i.e., situated in some holiday resort, without a settled minister or congregation, and only opened during the summer months for the benefit of visitors.

Here then is the result. In New England, although the population has largely increased, although liberal religion has had almost an ideal chance to thrive, it has made but a trifling growth. In the South, West and Middle States, where the conditions have been much harder, and where our churches have had, sometimes, to fight prejudice and bigotry worse than any ever found in England, a rapid advance has taken place. Of course it may be said that there was more need and room for new churches in the rising towns of the vast West and South. That explains why Unitarianism should grow there, but not why it has become stationary in the North-East States. The Unitarians of New England are awake to these facts, and frequent are the discussions.

Why not More Progress?

To us in Old England the interesting point is that the blame cannot be laid to any handicap in external advantages. Where our liberal faith enters the field on level terms with other competitors, to struggle to make its form of religious life prevail in the world, it yet appears to halt. And why? Because it still has opposed to it organisations and machinery of all descriptions. It is faced by contrivances, schemes, and counter-attractions, some of which it cannot even approve, much less adopt. And, above all, it finds tireless energy and an indomitable persistence in those who stand over against it as antagonists. For, apart from all State support or recognition, apart from the seductions of social prestige or tradition, there is a power of life in the orthodox sects of Christendom which has never been reckoned with sufficiently. They generate a faith in themselves, an ardour and intense earnestness, and equip themselves for their task like those who have a battle to fight and mean to win it. For this reason the task before the Unitarians is nowhere more formidable than in that free religious atmosphere of New England. Nowhere is there a greater demand on the enthusiasm and devotion of all who espouse the liberal cause.

Hopeful Tendencies.

Various tendencies are discernible in the churches which make for the strengthening of the liberal position. Two in particular strike an Englishman.

1.—There is the Tendency Towards Centralisation.

Organisation is still in the experimental stage, both in America and in England, and the subject opens up problems of the greatest delicacy. "United we stand, divided we fall," is true of us. And yet how can our individual congregations be brought to form an effective and solid unit, organised for definite ends?

In America there is a distinct tendency towards centralisation, I do not mean in government, but in missionary activity. The movement is towards strengthening the hands of the central missionary body, the American Unitarian Association, towards equipping it more generously with funds, inspiring more interest in its work, and elevating both the importance of the work and the men who carry it on. Its officers make it their first duty to keep the individual churches in close touch with the Association, and to knit them more firmly to the central body. Dr. Minot J. Savage, at the Unitarian festival last May, voiced what is the growing general sentiment. A Church begins to live its true life only as it is a missionary body. When all the equipments of its own individual existence are perfected it is only at the beginning of its true function. It must aim to reproduce its type in the world around and pour its strength into the agency through which this can be done. This is the growing sentiment, and it reflects itself in growing generosity towards the American Unitarian Association. Last year about three-quarters of the number of churches contributed to its funds, and a sum in simple division shows us that the average amount from each church was $171, or about £35 in English money, apart from personal contributions.

The same sentiment is shown in the rapidly lengthening list of life members of the Association. The last report shows that ninety-nine names were added during the year. Anyone who subscribes £10 is thereby constituted a life member, and a church can nominate an individual for the honour for every £10 it contributes. This latter rule is deliberately adopted to gain as many names as possible. For as the secretary pointed out in his last report, "It is fair to assume that every person accepting life membership in the Association can be relied upon for a permanent interest in the national work and for making generous contributions towards its support." The total roll of life members is now 2,423.

Another significant little fact is the formation of the "Brotherhood for Unitarian Missions" recently among the students of the Meadville Theological School. The object of the society is to study the work of Unitarian Church extension, and to equip the various members for a distinctly missionary service, as agents of the American Unitarian Association.

There is no section of the denomination antagonistic to the name "Unitarian," or at least it is not in evidence, which greatly facilitates all movements towards closer unity in America.

This then, I think, may fairly be described as one of the tendencies in America—more enthusiastic co-operation for forward work by means of the Central Association, which reacts on the churches themselves by giving them greater cohesion and a larger life.

(2) The Church Sentiment.

Of deep significance is the growing cultivation of the Church sentiment throughout New England.

In conformity with this is the growing distrust of all looser forms of attachment, and the effort to bind all members more closely to one another, and to the Church itself. Some simple form of "confirmation" service is being widely adopted, based on the view that the joining of the Church, by which an individual identifies himself with its motive, and assumes some of the responsibility of its welfare, is an act of consecration, and should be recognised as such. The minister, by means of "preparatory classes," makes it his aim thoroughly to expound the principles for which the Church stands to the rising generation, and to win sympathy and loyalty. Of course there is no creed. The roll that the new member signs simply states that he unites with the others for the worship of God, and the service of man in the spirit of Jesus.

All this has its effect on the Sunday-school. This, I believe, is being regarded less and less as something apart from the Church. It is the feeder of the Church. Its main function is to bring fresh life into that institution from year to year. It begins the development which the Church is to carry on. It fails just in so far as it fails in this, and it succeeds just in so far as its scholars on reaching maturity feel the impulse to identify themselves with the work and spirit of the Church.

The Unitarian in New England is face to face with the essential problem of liberal religion in a way we are not yet in Old England. Across the Atlantic fair and square is the struggle for existence, and the law of the survival and dominion of the fittest will work without let or hindrance.

Is our message one adapted to the needs of men and women in their present state of spiritual development? Can it generate sufficient energy and devotion to win its way to the fore in spite of energy and devotion antagonistic to it? Can it become organised sufficiently to offset all counter-organisations? Can it adopt a form of presentation as attractive as any? These problems would remain though we in England could sweep away every handicap under which we labour. Our very existence as a force in the world would still depend on the answer to these questions. America is concerned simply with them. And every Unitarian in England would do well to watch closely the developments there, for they will shed a piercing light on what are really the fundamental problems of the perpetuation of our Faith.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE SECRETARY.

Sir,—When the National Conference was started it was deemed advisable to appoint three or four honorary secretaries. They could act, it was thought, as a small sub-committee, and dispose of minor administrative details between the meetings of the Executive Committee. At that time the Conference was strictly a conference; its members met and interchanged opinions and cheered each other on; the committee appointed at one Conference had practically nothing to do except to make arrangements for the next Conference. But, in the first year of my presidency, the Conference took to itself power to act as well as to deliberate, and this at once threw more work on the Executive Committee. Various special committees were also appointed, and the clerical work is especially heavy as the date of a Triennial Conference approaches. Thus the business gradually became more than we can fairly ask our honorary secretaries to undertake. The Committee therefore came to the conclusion that a paid secretary must be appointed. It was thought by some of us, at all events, that an honorarium of, say, 50 guineas and his expenses would be an adequate remuneration, as, of course, there was no necessity for the secretary to give up any other employment. The Committee meets, as a rule, only three times a year.

But on this humble little administrative reform has since been grafted a wholly alien scheme. The paid secretary of the Conference, it is now said, must not only be the secretary of the Conference; he must also be a pastor-at-large. He is not merely to attend to the business of the Conference; he is to take command of the whole denomination. One of our leading ministers is to give up his pulpit and to wander round the country visiting congregations to whom he is personally unknown!

It is from this part of the project of the majority of the Committee that I respectfully but strongly dissent. I do not think we can spare any of our leading ministers from their pulpits. Experience has shown that the work which it is suggested the pastor-at-large should undertake is far better done by district missionaries working under a local committee who know the district and the people in it. Nor do I know where we could find the man who is both willing and able to undertake the office of an itinerant bishop, and to discharge the delicate duties of that office with firmness and with tact. Moreover, I doubt if our congregations would stand it!

Hence, while I approve of the appointment of a paid secretary, I protest against the idea of turning him into a pastor-at-large. I therefore gave notice of an amendment, the terms of which have already appeared in your columns. But as my suggestion of £100 a year as a maximum salary for our secretary has been misunderstood, and as it would, perhaps, be better to leave the Committee a free hand as to such financial details, I have modified the last sentence, and the amendment, which I hope to move on Thursday week, will run as follows:—

That the Committee be authorised to appoint a paid secretary of the Conference who shall not be a pastor-at-large, and who shall not be required to give his whole time to the work.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

Sir,—Will you allow me to again make appeal through your columns for subscriptions to the Children's Holiday Fund? It is known to most of our subscribers that on account of the small-pox epidemic the work was suspended during last summer. This year the arrangements have already been put in hand, and with some added regulations it is hoped that the work will be carried on with increased helpfulness.

The value of these holidays cannot be doubted. The minds and bodies of the children in our towns need to be stimulated by closer contact with nature.

Our Committee starts this year with a small balance in hand; but if as many children are to be sent away as in 1901 our subscription list will have to be enlarged.

I acknowledge with many thanks £3 3s. already sent by Mr. Hugh Martineau, and I shall be happy to receive further subscriptions. Parcels of clothing should be sent addressed to the secretary, Miss Morphy, 63, Elsham-road, Holland-road, London, W. A. J. Lawrence.

Campden-hill, London, W.
April 14.

The National Conference.—We have received from Mr. C. Fenton, the acting hon. secretary, the following addition to his letter of last week. Arising out of the report of the Committee the following resolutions will be submitted:—

1. That this Conference approves of the recommendation of the Committee that the congregations constituting the Conference be invited to provide funds for a ministerial secretary, who shall also act as pastor-at-large.

2. That this Conference sanctions the publication of a Conference Hymn and Tune Book compiled under the direction of the Committee, provided that the Conference is involved in no pecuniary responsibility.

3. That the report of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund be received and adopted.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The annual meetings of the above Association were held on Good Friday at Stockport. The morning service was held in the Unitarian Church, St. Petersgate, at which the Rev. S. A. Steinthal preached to a very large congregation from the text: "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service." The preacher said it was being gradually recognised that, under the rule of a holy God, there could be no such thing as a necessary evil. If mankind would learn each one to bring himself "a living sacrifice to God," trades which were productive of sin, but were defended as necessary, would be dealt with as the slave trade was dealt with in years past. The aim of Sunday-schools at the present day was not so much the inculcation of knowledge and the training of intelligence as it was some fifty years ago, when elementary education was less cared for than it is now. It is more and more directed to the training of character and the quickening of the religious life; and though, of course, where a well-trained intellect is combined with an earnest, devout, religious spirit we naturally look for better results, yet the true object was attained by the latter qualifications rather than by the former.

Between 700 and 800 sat down to luncheon. In the afternoon the business meeting was presided over by the president, Mr. J. Wigley, and there was a good attendance.

The Annual Report was, as usual, of a very interesting character. The committee presented it with feelings of continued and growing satisfaction. The variety and amount of the work done was increasing year by year. It was hoped that Sunday-school teachers would not see in the passing of the recent Education Bill any reason for abating their efforts or for withdrawing from their beneficent work. The statistics showed a decrease in the proportion of teachers to scholars, and, although it was very small, it was to be deplored. In the publishing department the hymns and choral songs, and the hymn-book, were selling well. The schools were also helped with Lesson Notes, and Bible Picture Rolls, &c., as aids to teaching. There has been a gradual falling off of interest in the examination scheme, until last year only 128 candidates presented themselves for examination from eight schools; while at the next examination, to be held at the end of this month, only four schools are entering, with, however, 201 candidates. The official visiting of the schools has been carried on systematically, and has been much valued by the teachers. The Temperance Branch is still efficiently carrying on its work of finding lecturers and providing lantern slides; and the winter lectures on religious, literary, and scientific subjects, have been appreciated by a number of the schools. This work is being extended by the purchase of additional sets of slides. At the Seaside Convalescent Home there were 68 children admitted during 47 weeks of the past year. The Holiday Home at Great Hucklow has caused some anxiety owing to unsatisfactory management; but the working has been put upon a different basis, and it is hoped that this year it will prove a complete success. Thus far, it has been largely experimental, but it is profiting by experience. Last year 546 under 16 years, and 493 over 16 years, total, 1,039 persons, stayed a full week, and 93 persons part week only. There was no serious case of illness during the season.

"The occasion of a week's residence of teachers with scholars gives increased opportunities of exercising a wise control over the young people, teaching them the joys of a quiet holiday, amidst country sights and sounds, and in a district full of interest; teaching them also proper behaviour at table, and insisting that no waste of food will be allowed. The duty of respect for other people's property should also be instilled into the scholars, and every opportunity be taken 'to soften manners,' and to increase the joy, pleasure and comfort of all concerned." The Financial Statement of the General Account shows an adverse balance of £69 11s. 10d., and there is also an adverse balance of £27 3s. 7d. on the Seaside Home Account. By the generosity of "A Friend" the deficit on the Holiday Home has been cleared off, and it will be the endeavour of the Homes Committee to make the institution self-supporting in the future. Over 40 new members have been added to the list of subscribers to the Association funds. It has been decided not to recommend the establishment of Boys' Brigades in connection with the affiliated schools. It is gratifying to note that the statistics of 72 schools that have sent in returns for both 1901 and 1902 show an increase of over 700 scholars, and a proportionately higher average attendance. A Bazaar in aid of the Holiday Home, Convalescent Home, and the general work of the Association, is to be held in the Lower Mosley-street school on April 15th, 16th, 17th and 18th. The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of Manchester has consented to officiate at the opening ceremony, when Alderman Harry Rawson will occupy the chair. The schools in various parts of the district have organised to provide goods for this effort, and it is hoped that the £1,000 required will be fully secured before the week is out.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, asked, What should be the aim of Sunday-schools to-day? The need was as great as ever. They might, with great advantage to the children, devote themselves more to religious and moral instruction, to the building up of character, to the giving of the right impulse in life to young people, and to their training in methods of self-help and thrift. For the first time we had had set up, by Act of Parliament, a system of education that claimed to be national, in the sense that no town or district in rural England would be without its school. It aimed at co-ordinating elementary and technical instruction. He referred to it in order to enforce one point. It would be a grave mistake to suppose that it meant there was now less need for the Sunday-school. On the contrary, if the country was to be saved from drunkenness, class hatreds, social inertia, a false and unchristian kind of patriotism, and from sordid and degrading selfishness, it would be by the intervention and the voluntary services of men and women who loved God and loved their fellow-men.

The Rev. A. Cobden Smith seconded.

Mr. J. Wigley was re-elected president; also all the secretaries were again elected; and their office is no mere nominal one, for the work of the Association in its various departments is very considerable.

A hearty welcome was accorded to the representatives of kindred associations, and was responded to by the Rev. J. Harwood, of the S.S.A.; the Rev. F. Allen, of the S.E.S.S. Union; Mrs. Wright, of the Midland S.S.A.; the Rev. C. H. Cook, of the Yorkshire S.S.U.; and the Rev. W. G. Price, of the North Midland S.S.A.

Mr. C. C. Grundy was thanked for his generosity in presenting long-service medals to a number of workers in the Sunday-schools.

The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, on behalf of the Liverpool S.S. Society, offered an invitation to the Association to hold its next annual meeting in that city, and it was unanimously accepted.

After tea, the evening meeting was held in the large room of the Stockport Sunday-school, and was presided over by the Rev. B. C. Constable.

The Rev. J. L. Haigh, of Liverpool, read a Paper on "The Use of Literature in our Sunday-schools." The Rev. J. Ruddle was the appointed speaker. Mr. Haigh put himself in the place of a man of forty who wanted to interest a class of boys in lessons drawn from the best examples of our English literature, and a very able case he made out. The speech of Mr. Ruddle's was no less interesting, and a hope was expressed that both paper and speech might be printed for circulation in our schools.

Our Stockport friends are to be heartily congratulated on the very marked success of the meetings; the catering was admirable, and, moreover, the day was fine. We cannot conclude this report without saying how everyone rejoiced to find the veteran preacher of the morning in such good health and spirits. His clear, strong voice filled the church so perfectly as to make many a far younger man almost envious.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

BAZAAR.

A very large and representative gathering assembled in the Lower Mosley School, Manchester, on Wednesday afternoon, on the occasion of the opening of a Bazaar for the purpose of raising £1,000, which is urgently required for the extension of various branches of work in connection with our Manchester District Sunday Schools. The large room in which the Bazaar was held was quite crowded.

Mr. Alderman Rawson occupied the chair, and the Lord Mayor of Manchester declared the Bazaar open. The Lady Mayoress was also on the platform. The proceedings opened with a hymn, which was announced by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who also offered up prayer. Alderman Rawson in his remarks referred to the fact that there were about 77,000 scholars and teachers in the eighty or so schools of the Association. Those institutions were to stimulate the young to virtue and piety. He was glad to see that prominence was given to the Temperance work, as drunkenness seemed to be on the increase. He also was in sympathy with the work of the Holiday and Convalescent Homes.

The Lord Mayor said he thought all Christian Churches, if true to their faith, were bound to engage in such work as that Association was doing. He was not a Unitarian, but he was not narrow-minded, and thought all men should be free to worship God in their own way. Let the vying of the Churches be with regard to good works. He complimented those present upon the large attendance. During his term of office he had been to a great number of bazaars, and theirs was one of the largest gatherings he had seen. He wished to emphasise what had been said about their Temperance work by assuring them that the experience of the City Watch Committee was that drink was the greatest evil that reformers had to deal with to-day.

A vote of thanks to Alderman Rawson, the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, was moved by the Rev. Charles Peach, and seconded by Mr. D. A. Little.

The style of the Bazaar was Japanese. The stalls looked extremely well filled with goods, and during the afternoon business was brisk. The attendance of friends from distant schools was encouraging, and judging by the opening day it will not be surprising to find at the end of the week that more than the £1,000 asked for has been received.

NORTH MIDLAND SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

Chesterfield was the meeting-place of the Association this year for the usual Easter Monday celebrations. A fair number of ministers and delegates attended, but naturally it was the northern part of the very wide and scattered district that was best represented. The meetings were characterised by a spirit of earnest perseverance and quiet confidence rather than any remarkable enthusiasm. The number of scholars on the books of the schools shows a slight decrease upon last year, but an increase upon the three years preceding the last. The report of the Committee showed that special attention had been given during the year to the system of Sunday-school visiting by competent and sympathetic officers of the Association, and in this connection the Secretary (Rev. W. Whitaker) has been permitted to make use of the forms drawn up by the Manchester Association.

The service in the chapel was conducted by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin. The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed preached a sermon in which the contrasted ideals of giving and getting were set forth, and applied as a test to the spirit of Sunday-school work and the subject-matter of the teaching. It was an earnest and eloquent plea for increased insight into the real needs of religious teaching.

The annual business meeting was presided over by Miss M. C. Gittins, who, along with the other officers and the Committee, received the thanks of the meeting for their year's work. The new President is the Rev. W. Lindsay; Vice-President, Mr. J. Larratt; Treasurer, Mr. W. Godfrey; Secretary, Rev. W. Whitaker; Visitors, Miss Gittins, Miss Weeks, Mr. E. Briggs, Mr. Whitfield, and Mr. W. G. Timmans.

At the evening Conference the new President delivered an impressive address upon the most needed notes in Sunday-school work. This was followed by a paper by the Rev. J. L. Haigh, which formed a striking and most memorable feature of the day's programme. The subject was "The Use of Literature in Sunday-schools." It is impossible to reproduce in a digest the ideas, much less the spirit and charm, of the paper, for there was over it all an inspiration and original power of thought that lifted us quite beyond the ordinary landmarks of routine discussion on Sunday-school subjects. All that we knew before was driven home further than we had imagined to be possible, and, in addition, new lights and leadings were struck out.

So an enjoyable and profitable day came to an end.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Belfast: York-street.—On Wednesday evening, April 8, the members of the Young People's Society held their annual social meeting in the lecture hall. After tea the Rev. A. Ashworth took the chair and delivered a short address, which was followed by a programme of music and readings.

Bridgend and Wick (Resignation and Appointment).—The Rev. David Rees has resigned the pastorate of the Rhondda Valley churches, and has accepted an invitation to take up the work at Bridgend, with the charge of the Wick congregation.

Burnley.—On Good Friday the "Spring Flowers" Fancy Fair and Sale of Work, organised by the Trafalgar-road congregation to reduce their debt of £300, was opened by Councillor William Healey, J.P., of Heywood, Alderman Bibby, of Burnley, presiding. In the course of an interesting speech, Mr. Healey emphasised the need there was amongst Unitarians to be Unitarians, not only at home, but wherever they were. If they believed in the cause, let them support it both at home and abroad. He also urged Unitarians not to allow the claims of public work to interfere with their duty to their churches. Hearty thanks were accorded to Mr. Healey and Mr. Bibby on the motion of Mr. Matthew Jobling, seconded by Mr. John Farrer. On Saturday Mr. David Harrison, of Padiham, reopened the Sale, and spoke of the need of disseminating our literature more widely, and deplored the want of interest, and even the ignorance he had discovered with regard to our weekly periodical literature. He urged his hearers to do all they could to secure larger circulations for The Inquirer and the Christian Life, feeling sure that if more widely read those journals would greatly aid in the propagation of our noble and simple faith. Mr. Harrison was warmly thanked for his services on the motion of Mr. J. S. Mackie, seconded by Mr. P. J. Hargreaves. A similar compliment to the Chairman, Mr. James Halstead, of Burnley, proposed by Mr. Peter Bibby and seconded by Mr. James Hargreaves, concluded the opening ceremony. The total proceeds of the two days' sale amounted to over £140, which is very gratifying, considering that the nearness of the great Manchester Bazaar prevented any general appeal to friends outside the town congregation. The claims of the Manchester Bazaar have not, however, been forgotten, and a parcel of goods, to the value of over £5, has been sent on to the larger Bazaar, besides contributions in money and in other ways.

Byker.—The anniversary soirée in connection with the Byker Unitarian Church took place on Good Friday. There was a large attendance. After tea a public meeting was held. Mr. J. Glendining occupied the chair, and a cheering account of the past year's work was given by Mr. Tron (the secretary). Excellent addresses were delivered by Messrs. T. Paxton, A. G. Peaston, and others, and vocal and instrumental music added to the enjoyment of the evening. The anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough. There were large congregations on each occasion, and the anniversary proceedings altogether were most successful.

Central Postal Mission.—At the April Postal Mission Conference held at College Chapel, Stepney Green, the subject of Tolstoy's "Resurrection" was introduced by the Rev. H. S. Perris in a very able and suggestive address. After giving a graphic sketch of the story, and commenting on the stage representation, Mr. Perris pointed out the great moral lessons to be learnt from Tolstoy's book, and that the leading thought in it was, that human beings, even the lowest and most sinful, might experience a moral resurrection by genuine repentance and rising out of their sins. The audience listened with deep attention, and the discussion which followed showed how much interest had been awakened. Mr. C. A. Ginever, Miss Florence Hill, and Mr. Seely took part in the discussion. The Rev. H. S. Perris, in replying, read a fine quotation from Tolstoy on moral regeneration.

Kidderminster.—Twelve months ago the New Meeting Guild of the Good Shepherd celebrated its "coming of age," having been formed on March 2, 1881. It was then agreed to place some memorial in the church as an expression of the members' thankfulness for the spiritual benefits they had received, and as an inspiration for future generations. The members decided to raise funds solely among themselves to place a stained glass window in the church; and at the rededication service on the eve of Good Friday (which was largely attended), the window was dedicated by the Warden, the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, who preached a very impressive sermon on the occasion. The window is of two lights, in each of which is a figure of Christ. In the first light he is represented as the Good Shepherd, with a little lamb in his arms. His robe is of a splendid ruby colour bordered with gold and jewels. In the other light Christ stoops down towards two little children who are running to him with outstretched arms to receive from him the bread that he is always ready to give. His robe in this case is of gold colour over a tunic of deep red. Both figures are upon a blue ground, and are in a framework of white foliage which sets off well the rich colours. At the base of each figure is a scroll, with the words "The Good Shepherd" and "I was hungry and ye fed me" respectively. Over each is a representation of the Guild badge (a cross with "In Hoc Vinces" round it). At the base is inscribed: "This window is erected by the past and present members of the Guild of the Good Shepherd in connection with this church, in grateful commemoration of twenty-one years of work and worship, and as an inspiration for the future. Easter, 1903." The work has been done by Messrs. John Hardman and Co., Birmingham, and is an excellent specimen of high-class workmanship.

London: Stepney.—On Sunday evening, April 5, Mr. C. A. Ginever conducted a very impressive service for the new members who, during the past month, had enrolled as members of College Chapel, and at the close a welcome was given to each, as they came up to receive a card of membership, from Mr. C. A. Ginever and Mr. John Evars (secretary and treasurer of the chapel). There were twenty-three in all, a large proportion of these being connected with the Sunday-school. The bright and earnest faces of the young people as they went down the aisle showed that a deep chord had been struck, and an impression made which seems full of promise for the future.

Newcastle upon-Tyne.—Large congregations gathered in the Church of the Divine Unity on Sunday, April 5, when the anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. Philip H Wicksteed. On the following day the anniversary soirée was held in the schoolrooms, followed by a public meeting in the church, the Rev. Frank Walters presiding, supported by the Revs. Charles Hargrove, W. H. Lambelle, Francis Wood, Henry Cross, and other friends. The Chairman briefly reviewed the position held by the congregation for 240 years, and concluded that down to the present day the influence of the church had been far-reaching, and that the need for its work was as great now as ever it had been. A very fine address was then given by Mr. Hargrove. Mr. Cross replied to a welcome given to the ministers and visitors from neighbouring churches, and members of the choir rendered vocal music at intervals during the evening. The meeting was most enthusiastic.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's-street.—The annual tea-meeting and sacred concert took place in the chapel on Good Friday. About ninety friends were present at the tea, and a large number were present at the concert, a good programme being creditably rendered by the choir and friends. Mr. T. Bond presided. The Revised Essex Hall Hymn Book is now used by the congregation, and is a step in the right direction in assisting to make the services brighter and more popular.

Saffron Walden.—On Good Friday the sixty-sixth annual tea and public meeting were held in the General Baptist Chapel. About ninety persons were gathered around the tea-tables, and the public meeting which followed was crowded to the doors, when a full and varied programme was rendered in great part by the Excelsior Band of the town, and very much appreciated. The other items consisted of choruses, glees, recitations; and addresses were given by the Revs. J. A. Brinkworth and W. J. Pond, and Mr. Harold J. Smith. On Sunday morning Mr. Brinkworth preached a thoughtful sermon on "Man's Resurrection Body," from 1 Cor. xv. 35. In the evening Mr. Pond conducted the service and delivered an impressive discourse from John xii. 24, "We die to live." Special hymns were sung and good congregations assembled.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The annual meetings were held at the Unitarian Church, Swansea, on Monday, April 6. The Executive Committee met at 11 30 for the transaction of preliminary business, and the meeting of delegates was held at 12.30. The chair was taken by the ex-president, Mr. H. W. Thompson, and the congregations of Aberdare, Cardiff, Carmarthen, Merthyr Tydfil, Nottage, Pontypridd, Swansea, Pentre and Clydach Vale were represented by ministers and delegates. The reports of the churches were encouraging, showing that much self-sacrificing work has been accomplished during the past year by the various ministers, often under adverse circumstances. The report of Executive Committee was largely taken up by the movement to establish a regular ministry at Bridgend. The committee were able to report that the settlement at Bridgend has at last been accomplished. A generous grant from the B. and F.U.A., aided by a grant from this Society, together with local resources, have enabled the trustees to appoint the Rev. David Rees as minister, who will also have the charge of the Wick congregation. The committee believe that the way is now open for good work to be done at Bridgend, and that Mr. Rees will be able to do it. The sympathy and support of the Society will go with him to his new charge. The Committee, in their annual report, regretted that the ministerial quarterly exchanges which, in the past, have been found so beneficial to the life of the churches, have not been carried out with anything like regularity during the past year or so. In the afternoon the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, of Clifton, the Rev. H. Fisher Short, of Aberdare, conducting the devotional service. At the annual meeting subsequently held, a hearty vote of thanks was extended to both ministers for their services, which were much appreciated. The annual report and financial statement were adopted, and the officers elected for the ensuing year: President, Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Phillips, of Aberdare; treasurer, Mr. L. N. Williams; secretaries, Rev. D. J. Williams and Mr. John Lewis. The Executive Committee were also re-elected, and three members to serve on the Advisory Committee. After tea a public meeting was held, Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson in the chair, when the general subject of the speeches was "The Message of Unitarian Christianity to the Present Age." Professor J. H. Weatherall gave a powerful address, pointing out the great need of the age—namely, intellectual sincerity. He gave a lucid exposition of Unitarian Christianity, showing the great work done by Unitarians in disentangling Christianity from the errors which have gathered around it during the centuries. The Revs. W. J. Phillips and R. J. Jones, Mr. G. C. Thompson, and Dr. Warschauer also delivered interesting addresses, and a helpful meeting was brought to a close. The hospitality of the Swansea congregation at luncheon and tea was much appreciated.

Swansea.—On Sunday, April 5, the 214th anniversary of the church was held, when the Rev. Dr. Warschauer preached two eloquent sermons to very large congregations. The sermons were a vindication of Unitarian Christianity, as well as a plea for enthusiasm in its promulgation.

OF

UNITARIAN, LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, FREE CHRISTIAN, PRESBYTERIAN, and other NON-SUBSCRIBING or KINDRED CONGREGATIONS.

EIGHTH TRIENNIAL MEETING AT LIVERPOOL.

APRIL 21—24, 1903.

THE National Conference was established in 1882, when the first meeting was held in Liverpool, and there, on Tuesday, April 21, the ministers and delegates and other members of our churches again assembled in great numbers for the Eighth Triennial Meeting of the Conference, thus celebrating the attainment of its majority in the city of its birth.

On the previous evening the annual meeting of the National Conference Guilds' Union had been held in Ullet-road Church, a reception of members and friends by the President of the Union (the Rev. Joseph Wood) being followed by a service in the beautiful church, conducted by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, at which the Rev. J. J. Wright gave a very earnest address from the words of Matthew x. 8—"Freely ye have received, freely give."

A large congregation joined in the service, and at the subsequent business meeting the Lecture Hall was well filled. The report showed encouraging progress in the Guild movement, and the dominant note of the addresses given by Mr. Richard Robinson and the Revs. E. W. Lummis and F. K. Freeston, was the need for giving in unselfish service of others, as the surest quickener of personal religious life. The President was in the chair. The Secretary, the Rev. John Ellis, the Treasurer, Mr. H. P. Greg, and the Rev. C. Hargrove also took part in the proceedings. This meeting for young people, and many others also "young in spirit," was a happy prelude to the meetings of the Conference itself.

TUESDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

St. George's Hall was the central meeting-place for the Conference, and there, on Tuesday afternoon, the members and friends, to the number, it was estimated, of about 800, gathered for the initial reception and to hear the President's Address.

The chair was taken in the small Concert Room shortly before four o'clock by Mr. Charles W. Jones, J.P. (local President), supported by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, President of the Conference; Professor Jean Réville, of Paris; Professor C. H. Toy, of Harvard; the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, L. de Beaumont Klein, Charles Hargrove, Joseph Wood, L. P. Jacks, H. Gow, W. H. Drummond, Mr. W. B. Bowring, Mr. Henry Jevons, and others.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, offered a very hearty welcome to the members and other friends present, and recalled the memories of twenty-one years ago, when the Conference was established. It was, he said, the one Unitarian effort which had succeeded from the very first, and without any drawback had admirably fulfilled its purpose in gathering the members of their churches together in conference. He then called upon the President of the Conference to deliver his address.

Before proceeding with his address Mr. Carpenter announced the arrangement made by the Committee with the Directors of THE INQUIRER for the issue of two enlarged numbers (April 25 and May 2) containing a complete record of the Conference, and stated that they had further decided to issue this special report in book form, which would be sold at 3d. a copy.

In the course of his address, here printed in full, Mr. Carpenter interpolated the remark that the suggestions it contained were not to be taken as made at the request of the Committee, but entirely on his own responsibility, dealing as they did with a matter on which he felt very deeply.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.

BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF OUR NATIONAL CONFERENCE, a twofold duty falls on me this day, to address you as your President on occasion of the eighth Triennial meeting, and to exhort you as preacher at this evening's service. I will not apologise for the goodwill of friends which has honoured me with this double task; but I will ask your indulgence if, in the weighty matters that I shall venture to lay before you, I trespass at undue length on your attention.

The Conference was born here, as everyone knows, one-and-twenty years ago. My first words must express to our generous hosts in Liverpool and the neighbourhood the gratification with which we again assemble in their stately city, and enjoy the fellowship of their activity. My next must congratulate the Conference itself on having attained its majority, with rich promise of future usefulness and strength. The retrospect since our nativity is not indeed without its shadows of loss as well as gain. Two names, though half a century has passed since this place knew them in fraternal partnership of faith and work, will rise at once in every memory with reverence and affection—James Martineau, whose birthday we commemorate this day, and John Hamilton Thom, who has become more widely known and more dearly loved through the ministry of the printed word, since his venerable presence passed from our midst. With them we naturally associate another distinguished servant of the Lord who filled two ministries in this city, Charles Wicksteed. Nor can we forget the brilliant and versatile powers of our first preacher, Charles Beard; the strenuous educational labours of Henry W. Crosskey; the rich devotional tenderness of Thomas Sadler, or the bright promise of Charles Perry. United with them as symbols of common purpose and trust are many honoured names, of our first treasurer, Thomas Chatfeild Clarke, of generous givers, wise counsellors, and earnest fellow-labourers, such as Sir Henry Tate, Thomas Ashton, William Hollins, Joseph Lupton, Frank Taylor, I. M. Wade, or pure and elevated spirits like Anna Swanwick and Lady Bowring, veterans all in the service of our churches, and the principles of religious liberty for which they stand. They leave us a great inheritance—their own example. They commit to us a weighty trust, not to be less faithful than themselves.

Significant Changes in Recent Years.

The period over which we cast our glance has been memorable for many things in our national life. Even since we last met, a Sovereign revered and beloved has laid down the burden of the throne, borne with unwearied sense of duty through unusual length of years; and we have received from her successor the assurance that the liberties of the Free Churches should suffer no detriment at his hands. We have seen the dominions of the Crown expand with breathless speed—would that I could say, without war. We have watched cities grow, and wealth accumulate; and if, on the one hand, there are grave dangers in the struggle for riches, if there is increased love of luxury, and heightened passion for display, there is also a rising sense of public duty, an ever-widening range for personal service, a constant inventiveness of philanthropy, and, as I at least believe, amid much uncertainty a real deepening of religious faith. The controversy with science which was vehement one-and-twenty years ago is now practically silent; and the great philosophical movement of the last generation is beginning to produce its true effect. On the side of human nature it has broken down the extravagant condemnations which declared the conscience totally corrupt, and the mind hopelessly impotent to know the truth; and has discovered the foundations of religion in the moral and spiritual faculties of man. On the side of the Bible it has enforced the historical method, at least in the Old Testament; and the wide acceptance of such a familiar book as Dr. Driver's "Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament" is a practical admission that the recognised principles of scholarship must be employed by all Churches in the study of the records of their religion. And on the side of theology it has abandoned doctrines of predestination, vicarious atonement, and everlasting punishment, which could not be harmonised with broader conceptions of the divine goodness. The changes recorded in the Catechism published on behalf of the Evangelical Free Churches in 1899 will not (many of us imagine) stop there. They are the result of the enforcement of ethical principles, for which we have long contended, in theology; they issue direct from methods of thought which we have defended in former days through opposition and obloquy. Their immediate consequence has been to bring the various Evangelical Churches into much closer alliance than was possible before, and enable them to offer a more united resistance to the increasing claims of Anglican sacerdotalism. Their remoter issue it is impossible to foresee; but at least it may be noted with satisfaction that the growing use of numbers of Unitarian hymns in the best modern hymnals, the recognition recently accorded to the life of Dr. Martineau, and the remarkable representation of various theological schools in the pages of the Hibbert Journal, are among the signs that the religion of the coming years of this Conference will be less exclusive, and barriers of suspicion and mistrust will little by little disappear.

The Progress of our Churches.

If we pass to the condition of our own churches, it is by no means easy to tabulate any definite results. Whatever we may be numerically, the question of first importance concerns the inner quality of our spirit, rather than outer circumstances of increase or decline. And on this subject I offer no opinion; our field is too small, and my own experience far too limited, to justify me in any definite conclusion. But some external facts are easier to estimate. It is frequently said, for instance, that we are dying out. This observation is so often repeated that there must, I suppose, be some truth in it. We all know cases where families of long standing in our churches have slowly disappeared, have left no descendants (even a peerage may sometimes become extinct), or, by removal from the locality or entry into some other communion, have lapsed from our fellowship of faith. But positive figures are very difficult to ascertain. What has been our history during the period of the existence of this Conference? Fifty-seven new congregations have been formed, and there has been a large amount of activity in the building of new churches and the expansion of old ones. But a figure such as this is of no value till it is placed beside others. Taking three periods of twenty-one years each for comparison, I believe that in 1840-1860 thirty-two new congregations acquired permanent stability. Between 1861-1881 the corresponding number was thirty-eight; and in the third and last, 1882-1902, it rose to fifty-seven. This is, perhaps, a small indication of quickening influence in which the Conference has had its share. On the other hand we have not kept pace in the provision of places of worship with the rapid increase of the population of the United Kingdom. Once more it is difficult to state the exact facts, for ancient chapels from which population has slowly moved away, such as those at Bewdley, Calne, and Topsham, have been closed, and no records exist to tell their tale. Occasional movements have been begun, and then abandoned; and private efforts sometimes failed to secure continuous support. But of the churches on our roll at the present day, there were, according to the best estimate that I can form, one for 112,225 persons in 1840; one in 106,815 in 1861, a slight advance; one in 113,296 in 1882; and finally, at the opening of 1903 one in 113,169. At the end of our third period of twenty-one years we have very slightly fallen behind the provision of 1840, and this would be more manifest if we excluded Ireland from the reckoning, where the population has actually diminished. Some of our urban congregations show grievous decline in strength; and Mr. Charles Booth, writing of "Life and Labour in London," says of the Unitarians that "their numbers are still dwindling."* On the other hand, congregations on the outskirts of our cities have multiplied; small churches have grown large and influential; and in the manufacturing districts of Lancashire and Yorkshire an anniversary service sometimes reveals imposing potentialities of sympathy and support.

In the Matter of Finances.

If from numbers we pass to a test, which, though crude, is still a test, our power to raise money, we may legitimately believe that this Conference has largely stimulated our common life. Two important funds, the Sustentation Fund and the Ministers' Pensions and Insurance Fund, each standing at over £20,000, are its direct creation. During the last three months I have endeavoured to collect returns from our churches, schools, and associations, to supply the basis of an estimate for this purpose. To the many treasurers and secretaries who have taken great pains to supply me with information, my sincerest thanks are due. The returns are unfortunately less complete than I had hoped. But they are sufficiently full to serve as the foundation of a serious reckoning. The "Essex Hall Year Book" enumerates 352 congregations (from its total 364 I deduct the chapel of Manchester College, Oxford, and 11 Domestic Missions) and 322 Sunday-schools. There are also about 70 associations, funds, and organisations of various kinds, for religious work. Of this latter group the returns are very nearly complete. They include associations like the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, our constituent District Associations, our theological Colleges, our Domestic Mission Societies, the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, the Sustentation Fund, the Ministers' Benevolent Society, the Pensions and Insurance Fund, and many more. The total raised for these purposes by voluntary gift during the twenty-one years 1882-1902 reaches the sum of £714,000. Out of 352 congregations only 193 have sent in figures. Here and there a treasurer was too busy to abstract the items from twenty-one balance-sheets. In some cases the office had passed from hand to hand, books had disappeared, and no one knew the history of so long a period. In a few instances no accounts at all could be produced. The general inquiry has, I confess, impressed me strongly with the feeling that considerable amendment in the business organisation of many of our congregations is desirable, if we are to be even ordinarily efficient. The fact remains that 193 churches out of 352, roughly speaking 5 out of every 9, have furnished returns: 23 of these expressly included their Sunday-schools, while 104 schools sent separate figures. The total of 193 churches and 127 schools (out of a joint total of 674) have received voluntary gifts to the amount of £1,044,000. The two sums I have named may be placed roughly at one million and three-quarters. There remain 159 congregations in London, Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, and all over the country, large and small, in each part of the United Kingdom, which have made no return, and 195 schools, though some of these may have been included without mention in congregational figures. In the proportion of 4 to 5 already indicated, these might be set down at £800,000. But in order to be well within the mark let us place their total within the modest limits of a quarter to half a million. The general result then is that our churches have raised for the various purposes of our religious work a sum between two and two and a quarter millions in the last twenty-one years. I am confident that we have never done anything like that before. To that extent we may take comfort, and assure our critics that we are still alive, or at least are making a pretty vigorous decease. I should have been glad, had it been possible, to make these figures more exact, and to have analysed them more closely. But we are only feeling our way to common action, and I ought, perhaps, to be thankful that five out of every nine church officers were willing to give time and thought to my inquiry. In particular it would have been desirable to distinguish between sums raised for ordinary income and sums for special purposes; for new buildings in church and school; for repairs, enlargements, and decorations; for organs and other aids to devotional service. According to the best estimate I can form, and in this Mr. Bowie, I believe, after inspecting my figures, concurs, we may place the annual sum raised by our congregations for the current expenses of their churches and schools, by voluntary gift, exclusive of endowment, and of all aids derived from associations and funds of every kind, at about £50,000.

Some of the items of these figures have suggestive interest. When Manchester College was planted at Oxford, £55,000 was raised in four years from about 700 donors. The recent Ministers' Pensions and Insurance Fund was gathered in less than twelve months, over a much wider area, and included more than 1,000 separate contributions; but there were many churches which sent little or nothing. If all our congregations were to unite in a common effort, we might do with ease what otherwise were done only with difficulty, or not done at all.

Free Churches and a Doctrinal Association.

The condition of our churches will form the subject of a paper at this Conference, and I am not desirous now to anticipate in any way the judgments or the plans which may be submitted to you. But we all know that our forces are to some extent divided by differences of opinion (of long standing among us) as to the proper basis of our organisation. Some here may remember the protest that was raised nearly forty years ago against the retention of the principle of Congregational representation in the constitution of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. It was felt that the union of individuals for the purpose of promoting particular doctrinal views, which was itself perfectly legitimate, was not suitable for congregations whose whole history pledged them to the principle of open trusts. In the discussions of that time our most venerated leaders, John James Tayler, James Martineau, John Hamilton Thom, took a leading part, with the result that in 1867 the Congregational representation was dropped, and the Association became what it has been ever since, a body of particular persons who desire to promote the spread of certain conceptions of religious truth which appear to them of high importance. We know what has happened. The Association has been administered with remarkable zeal and efficiency. It has gathered into itself much of the best interest of our people. It has been able to raise large amounts, reaching £86,000 in the last twenty-one years. It has done a noble and far-reaching work; and only within the last two months emphatic testimony has been afforded to the confidence with which it is justly viewed, by the generous response to the challenge of a munificent donor, which has placed at its disposal an additional yearly income of £3,000.

Now, among the functions which the Association has been led by force of circumstances to assume, is that of making grants in aid of our churches. It has done so for three reasons. Firstly, because such aid was needed; secondly, because it had the means; and thirdly, because there was no other organisation to do it. But the feeling undoubtedly exists in some quarters, I do not know how widespread it may be—it is at least powerful enough to lead some valued workers to stand aloof—that it would be better if this duty were not thrown upon the Association. It is regarded (to put it in its extremer form) as a violation of principle for churches of open trust to receive help from a doctrinal organisation. Dr. Martineau, after taking part in the formation of the Provincial Assembly for London and the Southern counties, actually felt himself obliged to withdraw from it in a year or two, because (in accordance with similar usage otherwhere) its Committee was the medium of transmitting grants from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the local congregations on its roll. That was a signal expression of his conviction that at all costs the principle of our open trusts must be preserved unsullied by the smallest taint of compromise.

What Ought to be Done.

What, then, are we to do? It is generally admitted that if we were beginning over again, we should not assign this work to a doctrinal association; but no one has yet had audacity enough to propose a way out of the difficulty. The stumbling-block lies of course in this. The Association spent in round numbers last year the sum of £2,000 on this department of its work. The amount naturally varies slightly. In some years it may increase, in others decline, according to the number of new enterprises needing help. No one would for a moment suggest that the Association should divest itself of this amount of revenue, and hand it over to any other body for the purpose of enabling it to do at first, probably, with less efficiency, what the Association has learned by long experience to do with tact, promptitude, and success. If there is any other body which might, in the general opinion of the churches, be constitutionally better fitted to perform the work, that body must first show that it possesses the requisite resources.

The Conference should Undertake the Care of the Churches.

Now three years ago this Conference acquired a definite constitution. The various local Associations ranged themselves along with it; and are represented on its administrative board. It is the belief, at any rate, of some—I know not how many—both ministers and laymen, that this Conference is the proper body to be the organ for raising and administering the funds that are needed for congregational aid. Then, I say boldly, if this thing is seriously desired, if we hold the principle strongly enough to make sacrifices for it, the Conference must raise the money. Assuming that the yearly sum gathered by the churches is £50,000, can we not in five years collect six years' income? If those who provide £50 a year will find £60; if subscribers of £10 will give £12; if contributors of 5s. a quarter, or a year, will pay 6s., the money might be raised with ease. After all, this is less than the Salvation Army gathers by a single week of self-denial. It would take twelve months to get such a scheme fairly started. The constituent associations must be consulted. Meetings must be held, details discussed, and ministers and people must confer together. But with the needful energy, if all will co-operate in a common effort, such a plan might be carried to a successful issue without imposing too great a financial strain on anyone. Doubtless some congregations would decline even this modest amount of self-taxation, and it would be needful to invite individual gifts as well. But we may hope that they would not be wanting. I have no millionaire's donation in my sleeve. But I know a theological lecturer who may be good for five or six years' more service, who would gladly give £100 a year for five years to assist such a scheme, to engage us in united action, to draw our forces together, to heal breaches of want of sympathy or mistrust, and send forward our common cause with new energy and life. It would need a year, perhaps, to place such a plan fully before our people. By that time local enterprises now on foot would be accomplished, and perhaps the era of bazaars would for a time be suspended. Were such an effort deliberately carried out, in six years from now the Conference would find itself in possession of £50,000, to be employed for the common good of the churches. That would produce an annual income of £1,500; we should need £2,000. I will point to a source for the remaining £500 directly. If the Conference then approached the Association, and offered to relieve it of the duty of making grants in aid, it may be anticipated that the Association would willingly respond. It would regard the creation of such a fund as a serious expression of desire on the part of the churches that they should take in hand the management of their own affairs, and it would relinquish an onerous duty with complete goodwill. The Association would, in fact, have a large surplus income set free for the expansion of its work in other directions, and though this surplus might possibly suffer some temporary decline, I have such faith in the generosity of our people, and in the power of the Association to show continually enlarging fields of labour, that we need not expect such abatement to be grave. And with this trust I further believe that the Conference might not unsuitably ask the Association to recommend the congregations to transfer to their own representative body the collections—last year amounting to £575—which now go to Essex Hall. This would yield at least £500 more, and the necessary sum would thus be secured.

An Eirenikon.

Is this a paper plan? I offer it with all modesty, but with all earnestness. A survey of the incidents of the last twenty-one years will convince anyone that if we wish to do this thing we can. There may be better ways for reaching the same end than that which has now been suggested. If we do not care that the churches should learn to do their own work of self-maintenance and aid, if we do not really wish to bring before the strong the needs of the struggling and the weak, if we do not desire to generate a common sympathy and promote a common aim, why, then, I suppose, we must go on as we are, and it will be the duty of each one of us to put as much energy as he can into the agencies which he finds at hand. But I venture to propound this suggestion in the interests of both our organisations. On behalf of the Conference it may be urged that the representative body of the churches is the natural form of union through which the needs of the churches should be expressed and supplied. I know, indeed, that this cannot be done without labour. Such an administration would have to feel its way, and could not at first be as efficient as that which at Essex Hall has acquired so large an experience, and formed so useful a tradition. Yet the risk would not last long; many of the same men might be engaged in the new work; the experience of the officers of the Association would not be withheld; and there would be a similar spirit of impartial devotion to the welfare of all. And on behalf of the Association it may be pleaded that the relief a few years hence from a serious and constant strain upon its funds will fit it the better to cope with the increase of missionary duty of many kinds alike at home and abroad which is sure to devolve upon it. Among the most signal features of interest in these latter days has been the formation of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers under the initiative of our American friends, which held its first general meeting in London two years ago. No one who was present at that great gathering, which owed so much of its success to the skill and energy of Mr. Bowie, can fail to have received from it a deep impression of the growing force of the new thought and life that are rising in various forms all round the globe. In stimulating that growth the Association, which so many of us love, must take a constantly increasing share. It will be the missionary organ of our people, and will more and more bring home to us the conviction that we, too, have a Gospel to preach, worthy of effort, sacrifice, and devotion. There should be no rivalry among us, save in good works. The field is wide, the call is urgent. God give us grace to see our opportunities, and strength to achieve the work they open to us!

At the conclusion of the President's address the Chairman offered a cordial welcome to the two foreign delegates present. Professor Jean Réville, of Paris, he welcomed as an old friend, and could not speak of him more fittingly, he said, than in the words of the Rev. Edwin Odgers, at the beginning of a review in last week's Inquirer:—

> M. Jean Réville is known to us in this country not only as a scholar and critic of the first rank, and as editor of the Revue de l'histoire des Religions, but as the leader of the liberal wing of the Reformed Church of France, and the champion and defender of its principles and its rights.

He then made a happy reference to France as the land of sunshine and cheerfulness, and added:—We shall ever feel grateful to France for having sent us at Ullet-road a preacher who Sunday after Sunday for eight years has charmed us with his eloquence, instructed us with his learning, and encouraged us with his enthusiasm for the faith which is so dear to all our hearts.

Professor Réville, in responding to the very hearty welcome he received, said that he should be abashed if he did not remember that it was not to him personally but to the representative of the liberal French Huguenots and the brotherhood it represented that it was offered. He had the pleasure of bringing to them a letter of greeting from the Baron F. de Schickler, President of the Délégation Libéral, in the name of the liberal Reformed Churches of France. M. Réville then read the following letter, after which he delivered a valuable address on the work of the Liberal Churches in France. This address in its complete form, with passages referring also to Switzerland and Holland, which M. Réville, for lack of time, did not read, is printed at the conclusion of this report.

ADDRESS FROM THE LIBERAL PROTESTANTS OF FRANCE.

A Monsieur le Président de la National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, and other Non-Subscribing or Kindred Congregations, Liverpool:—

Monsieur et très honoré Président,

La Délégation Libérale des Eglises Réformées de France est heureuse de confier á Monsieur le Professor Jean Réville la mission de la représenter à votre Conférence et de vous apporter, dans cette occasion solennelle, ses plus cordiales et fraternelles salutations.

Il vous dira l'intérêt que nous inspirent vos travaux, la sympathie avec laquelle nous suivons vos progrès et les vœux que nous formons pour que vous voyiez de plus en plus s'affirmer et se développer en Angleterre les principes qui nous sont chers: la foi personnelle et vivante, l'affranchissement des consciences chrétiennes et l'union de tous ceux qui, selon la parole d'un de nos devanciers, Samuel Vincent, déclarent que "le fond du Protestantisme c'est l'Evangile et que sa forme est le libre examen.

Nous demandons à Dieu de bénir vos délibérations et vous prions d'agréer, Monsieur le Président, et de transmettre à vos honorés collègues, l'expression de nos sentiments les plus fraternels et les plus dévoués en Notre Seigneur.

Baron F. de Schickler,
Président de la Délégation Libérale des Eglises Réformées de France.

Paris, le 17 Avril, 1903.

The Chairman, in welcoming Professor Toy, said that he must qualify the word "foreign" delegate, and welcomed him rather as a brother from across the Atlantic. He also introduced the British Unitarian Church to Professor Toy, as it appears to some of its friends, and made amusing reference to the old fable about "dying out."

Professor Toy, acknowledging the welcome, said he was delighted to be allowed to come not as a foreigner, but as a brother of the same blood and of the same faith. He regretted that he did not come precisely as an authorised delegate, as it was not known by his people that he could be there, but he was sure he could bring their most earnest and cordial sympathy with the work of that Conference. He regretted also that he could not offer any statistics of the progress of liberal religion in America, for he had been absent for nearly a year, and very likely they knew more than he did. But one general remark he might make with regard to their churches in America. Dr. Edward Everett Hale used to say that in Boston the really established religion was the Unitarian, though perfect liberty was allowed to other Churches; but, at present, in Boston and Cambridge, and the country generally, there was no Established Church, but recognition was given to all alike. He would, he believed, be expressing the general feeling of the members of the Liberal churches in America if he said that they did not look primarily as evidence of the advance of their principles to increase of membership. The churches looked rather for their strength to the advance of principles, and a ground and impulse for the advance of such principles to the general progress of the world. Without undue boasting or egotism, they might say that it was the general advance of the thought of the world that had given greater prominence to the principles of religion they professed. He noted the advance in science, and more particularly in two sciences comparatively recent, that of the comparative study of religions of which M. Réville, editor of the Revue de l'histoire des Religions, was so distinguished a representative, and that of Biblical criticism and exegesis, a science which had been recently so ably expounded by Professor Carpenter in his lectures. There were many signs of progress and encouragement in these matters. He rejoiced in the signs of progress set forth in the President's address, and concluded by heartily wishing them God-speed.

A GLIMPSE AT THE LIBERAL CHURCHES IN FRANCE, SWITZERLAND, AND HOLLAND.

BY PROFESSOR JEAN RÉVILLE, OF PARIS.

According to the desire of the Committee of this Conference, I propose to give a short review of the kindred work of the Liberal Churches in France, Switzerland, and Holland. I want your greatest indulgence for my bad English, and my still worse pronunciation. If I dare to speak under such circumstances, it is because I am sure of the sympathy of an audience which contains only spiritual brethren.

For the better understanding of the following description, I may remind you that in France, as well as in Switzerland and in Holland, the Protestant Reformed Church is a national one, with more or less complete Presbyterian organisation. The ministers of the Church are paid by the Government—very scantily indeed—and the Church constitution was established by the State. No constitutional modification can be introduced in the National Church without being sanctioned by the State's authority. In all three countries most of the Protestants care a great deal about this national character of the Church, and therefore they do not readily enrol themselves in free or separate Churches.

Another common feature of those National Churches is now their democratic organisation. They all three enjoy universal suffrage, in France only for the election of the parish councils, elsewhere also for the election of the clergymen. But these democratic institutions result very differently for liberalism in proportion to the enlightenment and religious training of the people.

France.

Let us see first how the situation stands in France. There Protestantism is only the religion of a small minority.

The official statistics have not for a long time noted the religious denomination of French citizens, so we cannot know exactly how many Protestants there are in France; but we may reckon from six to seven hundred thousand among more than 37,000,000 of Roman Catholics. Happily, a great part of these are only Catholic in name. I think many hundreds of thousands of them are nearer to Protestant principles than to the Roman faith; yet they are not at all inclined to become members of Protestant churches.

Those of the people who are avowedly Protestants are divided into 104 Consistoires, each of which includes several parishes. From those 104 Consistoires, of very unequal size and importance, nearly one-third belong to the liberal party. Amongst them there are very various dogmatic opinions; some are more conservative than others, but they all maintain that the membership of the French National Protestant Church must not be bound to any dogmatic confession of faith.

Nearly all these liberal Consistoires are in the South of France, in the mountains of the Cévennes, where the Huguenots found a refuge in the time of the persecution. Lyon, Nîmes, Montauban, Montpellier, are the most important of those churches. According to their liberal principles, the parish councils in these cities always leave one or two appointments of preachers to the orthodox party. Nevertheless, the orthodox have established there free churches in rivalry with the National Church, because they think it impious to admit in the same pulpit liberal and well-believing ministers.

In the North of France there is but one liberal Consistoire, that of Le Hâvre. The Reformed Church of Paris has a strong orthodox majority, which denies even one liberal clergyman to the important liberal minority. In the central parish only, of the Oratoire, where the liberals have a majority, the Consistoire has authorised a liberal vicar to exercise the ministry, the Rev. J. E. Roberty, a most talented preacher, who draws the most numerous audiences of all Protestant clergymen in Paris.

In other parts of the great city the liberals have been obliged to organise their own services and their own religious instruction for the young. So we had, until this year, regular Sunday services conducted by the Rev. E. Fontanès, who now has unhappily retired; and we still have the ministry of a most distinguished man, the Rev. M. Wagner, whose sermons unite in one religious communion auditors of very various ecclesiastical origin, and whose books are translated into nearly all Protestant languages. But the attachment to the National Church is so strong that the liberals of Paris could never take upon themselves to create a complete Free Church organisation. Neither in the parish of Fontanès nor in that of Wagner is Holy Communion given, nor are children baptised or marriages celebrated. For all these solemn religious acts we go to the National churches. There we are not allowed to preach, but we are authorised to baptise, to marry and to celebrate burial services as they are usual in France, and so we speak often to a much larger audience than we should have in an ordinary Sunday service, for in France the attendance at Sunday service is by no means so general as in England.

Acute Division since 1872.

The division between liberals and orthodox became most acute after the Synod of 1872, when an intolerant majority tried to expel out of the Church the electors and the clergymen who would not subscribe a new confession, which seemed the minimum that right-believing people could require. The State, however, did not ratify these synodal decisions. So the liberals remained, protected against the passionate intolerance of their orthodox brethren by the tolerant spirit of a free thinking Government. Since that time there is officially only one Reformed Church of France, but really there are two: one which is called synodal, the other which is called liberal. The first has a complete Presbyterian organisation with twenty-one local synods. Every three years they have their general synod which chooses a board of eleven members, called la Commission Permanente, to watch over common matters. The liberals, at the other side, have also their own organisation. They have no local synods, but every three years the liberal Consistoires send delegates to a general Conference, which chooses also a board of fifteen members, called la Délégation Libérale.

During nearly twenty-five years there was a hard struggle between the two parties. The liberals were obliged to organise for themselves many ecclesiastical or philanthropic societies, because they could no longer take their part in the existing ones. Such were the Réunion Protestante de Charité, founded by Athanase Coquerel in Paris; the Mission Intérieure du Gard in Nîmes, for promoting religious life in the country; the École Samuel Vincent in Nîmes, for preparing future liberal clergymen; the Association Fraternelle des Pasteurs Libéraux, with many local sections and general meetings for maintaining a living spirit of union between the often too distant liberal preachers. They have also their own periodicals —Le Protestant, Le Libéral Evangélique, Le Foyer Protestant. In the meantime some active liberal clergymen began, on their own account, a very successful interior mission amongst Catholic country people, for instance, M. Robert in the South-west (Charentes), and M. Comte in the neighbourhood of St. Etienne.

Approaches Towards Reunion.

This struggle of a quarter of a century gave a sufficient proof that neither party was powerful enough to overcome the other, but that on both sides many forces were lost in internal contests, which could have been used much better against common enemies. The liberals were the first to invite their Protestant brethren to unite in common action. Their appeal was heard by many young orthodox preachers, who recognised that in a country like France, where the Protestants are such a small minority, it was more necessary than elsewhere to avoid such division. So in 1896 a general conference of delegates of all the Consistoires was called together at Lyon by a private committee. In 1899 a second conference was held, and so powerful was the spirit of union in those meetings, that the orthodox leaders did not dare to act against it. A Commission Fraternelle was established to deal with matters common to the whole Reformed French Church. Unhappily, to avoid disagreeable contests, it was decided that this Commission Fraternelle should be simply the reunion of the orthodox Commission Permanente and the Délégation Libérale. Such a constitution is somewhat paralysing. Nevertheless the pacific tendency is so predominant that even the Commission Fraternelle was obliged to ask the Government at the end of last year to authorise the restoration of the complete Presbyterian system, that is to say of a general Synod, where delegates of all the National Reformed Churches would sit together.

Naturally the liberals have taken this course only because they are convinced that in a new general Synod no further attempt would be made to expel them from the Church. Indeed, the situation is now quite different from that of 1872. The orthodox have learned that the State would never lend a hand to the expulsion of the liberals. Under the influence of the Paris Theological School, especially of the late Professor Sabatier, a large number of the young preachers have freed their faith from dogmatic bias, and, above all, the chief concern of an ever-increasing proportion of them is social reform rather than theological questions proper. They think that the most important task for the Protestant Church in France is to be devoted to moral and social reform and that Christ came not to teach theology, but to heal the sick and regenerate humanity; and for that purpose liberals and orthodox can work together. For that purpose a Commission d'Action Morale et Sociale was created at the last meeting at Lyon, and I feel sure from our experience of the theological students in Paris that all their sympathy is with this tendency.

So we may say that the liberal principle has not only maintained itself in France, but that it is extending itself to a new part of the Church, amongst those who call themselves the party of the Right Centre. Our country is at this moment in a very important religious crisis. The anti-clerical movement has become so strong that Catholicism itself seems to be shaken. But for a very large mass of the people anti-clericalism is synonymous with anti-religious. The socialistic democracy is in great part opposed to any kind of religion, so that large numbers of the people, not only Catholics, but Protestants also, turn away ever more from the Church.

A great duty is thus incumbent on Liberal Protestantism: it has to convince the best part of the democratic and socialistic reformers, amongst whom there is really a noble spirit of idealism, that a free Christian, undogmatic, really evangelical faith in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of men is perfectly reconcilable with modern science and modern philosophy—nay, that such a free religion is the best support of the amelioration of society; and it has to convince all classes of traditional Christians that, if they do not disengage the moral and spiritual treasure of the Gospel from the obsolete dogmatic form in which it is set, the Christian religion itself will be thrown away with the tradition of the Church.

The question is, will there be men of sufficient spiritual power in our little community of French Protestants to carry out such a great work—really a new reformation in France—in the Church no less than among the people outside? Liberal Protestants, whom the Churches found too radical—Pécaut, Buisson, Steeg, and many others—were the most active agents of the great reform which introduced in France compulsory and undogmatic schooling. But will there be men powerful enough to emphasise the necessity of a religious basis for moral training, social as well as individual, and to persuade that democracy, which is perpetually tossed from superstition to unbelief?

Switzerland.

In Switzerland there is the same urgent need. But here the conditions are perhaps better, at least where the majority is Protestant. In Switzerland there is no ecclesiastical unity. The situation is different in each canton. Liberal Protestantism is powerful, specially in some German cantons, as St. Gall, Glarus, Zürich, Berne. It has its centre in the Schweizerisches Verein für freies Christenthum, which was founded in 1871, and which has sections in most of the German cantons and in Geneva. The focus of Liberal Protestantism has been there the University of Zürich, with Schweizer, Biederman, Hirzel, Lang, and many others. The Swiss liberals organise lectures; they have their own periodicals: Religiöses Volksblatt, Schweizerisches Protestantenblatt, Schweizerische Reformblätter; the Progrès Religieux, of Geneva, has unhappily been obliged to cease its publication; they have a committee for encouraging theological study, they diffuse pamphlets and religious works, remarkable religious hymn and prayer-books for the development of liberal opinions. Let us not forget their excellent Schwesternanstalt zum roten Kreuz in Zürich, where liberal nurses are educated.

In the cantons where the preachers are elected by universal suffrage, the liberals generally have some able representatives.

The opposition, especially from the higher classes, seems to become milder. In such cities as Basel or Geneva, the liberal Church organisation is acknowledged even by the conservative Protestants. But there are still cantons, as that of Vaud and Neuchatel, where liberalism has no place at all in the Church.

In Switzerland it often seems that the democracy is becoming much more indifferent to religious matters than it was in the period of 1870 to 1890, when the liberal ecclesiastical reforms were introduced in the Church constitution. Here also the influence of Socialism, German or French, is not favourable to religion. When I read the reports of the Verein, I feel that amongst the young generation they care much more for social and moral reforms than for free theology or reform in Church institutions. They clearly think that the only way to retain a part of the populace is to devote themselves to a social Christianity. This is specially the case in Berne.

Holland.

In Holland, on the contrary, the popular crowds in the large cities are till now generally faithful to orthodoxy. Since the introduction of universal suffrage no liberal preachers are any more appointed in cities such as Amsterdam or Rotterdam. Liberalism has its adherents among the bourgeoisie in certain country places, and in the middle classes of small towns.

Happily the intolerance of the most Calvinistic orthodox did not allow them to wait till they had gained a majority in the National Synod. They could not endure the idea of living in the same Church with what they call unbelievers. Under the inspiration of Dr. Kuyper they tried to elude the authority of the Synod and to force their own severe Calvinistic doctrines not only upon the liberals, but even upon the conservatives, whom they call the ethical party, and who remained obedient to the Synod. So they were obliged in 1886 to leave the National Church themselves, not being able to drive out their opponents.

Thus the National Church remained open to liberals or, as they call them in Holland, modernen. But they are a minority. Their chief association is the Nederlandsche Protestantenbond, founded in July, 1870. Last year it included 158 sections with a total membership of 18,750 persons. This association leaves the greatest independence to its sections. There is no centralisation at all. The only common principle is the condemnation of every obligatory confession of faith.

There is a great difference of activity between the different sections. Generally they organise their own Sunday-schools, religious teaching for the young, and also divine service where there is no liberal clergyman; they promote lectures and diffuse books; they have a postal mission, a periodical, the Hervorming; they have published hymn-books, and for these last twenty years have devoted part of their activity to philanthropic and social works. We must note here especially that an ever-increasing place is made in all those duties for women.

But in their reports they complain of insufficient financial subscriptions. It seems that many among the wealthier citizens who belong to the liberal tendency prefer to seek a refuge out of the National Reformed Church, in the Remonstrant, in the Mennonite, even in the Walloon denominations, or in Amsterdam in the Vrije Gemeente of our friend Hugenholtz, rather than to pay for the Protestantenbond in cities where the National Church is totally orthodox.

Conclusion.

These general informations will be sufficient, I hope, to prove that liberal Protestantism has done a good deal of work in the countries of which I have spoken, not, indeed, as much as was needed, but enough to maintain our principles and to prepare for a more complete victory. The next struggle, I think, will be fought more on social than upon special theological ground. But here also we feel sure that our principles of liberty and free religious and scientific faith will secure the best results.

At the conclusion of the Welcome the company adjourned for tea in the Crown Court and Library, and in the evening the religious service was held and the Conference sermon preached in the Philharmonic Hall.

THE EVENING SERVICE.

A great congregation gathered in the Philharmonic Hall for the Evening Service. The singing of the hymns, led by the organ and the united choir in the orchestra, was in itself an inspiration. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, B.A., of Bury, who read for the lesson the opening passage of Matt. xxv. and part of Romans viii. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, President of the Conference. Before the service Mr. H. Grimshaw gave a selection of music on the organ. The choir was under the direction of Mr. Lee Lloyd. Both hymns and tunes were chosen with a true instinct for a great occasion, opening with Samuel Longfellow's "O Life that makest all things new," and closing with Alford's "Forward! be our watchword."

THE CONFERENCE SERMON.

"THE CHURCH OF THE LIVING GOD."

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.

"I am come that men may have life, and may have it abundantly."—John x. 10.

"The Church of the living God."—1 Tim. iii. 15.

Each great contribution to man's religious advance has its characteristic note of thought and feeling, and sums up its outlook on the world in some significant word. Go back to ancient India, and you will find all the worth of religion, in law and morals, in ritual and philosophy, in song of praise or vision of mystic insight, gathered under one head; it is Veda, or sacred knowledge. Pass to the West, and enter the schools of Greece, no voices of revelation will impart to you assurance of divine things, but Pythagoras describes himself as a lover of wisdom, and philosophy becomes the name of the ever lasting search for truth. Traverse the deserts of Arabia, where nature is all-powerful, and man cannot bend her to his will, and the prophet's call demands the absolute subjection of self in unquestioning trust: religion, therefore, takes the form of Islâm, submission, or the surrender of mind, heart, soul, and strength, beneath the eternal sovereignty of God.

Is there any one word which may in the same way express the inner meaning of Christianity? The Gospel, it may be said. But two of the biographers of Jesus, Luke and John, tell the story of his word and deed, and never name it. In modern times it has become identified with some form of theology. But, after all, Christianity is more than a system of belief, however dear the great theological ideas of Trinity and Incarnation, of Atonement and Sanctification, may have become to the disciple. The phases of thought have changed from land to land; they have been reshaped by successive generations, and Christianity has remained something more than doctrine, something deeper than a creed. Or shall we say the Church, with its manifold institutions, its hallowed rites, its solemn mysteries of worship, its treasury of sacraments, its army of the faithful—prophets and apostles, martyrs and saints, priest and layfolk—the immense multitude of believers in warfare in this world, in victory in the next? No one can look with indifferent eyes on a conception which has drawn to itself such passionate homage, has been the inspirer of poetry and art, and still knits together souls of all races in one vast communion. Yet the Gospels, as we read them to-day, prove beyond question that Jesus could never have contemplated shutting up the kingdom of God in one dogmatic association, nor have foreseen the courses of history which at the end of eighteen centuries show no signs of coming to a close. The Christianity of Christ is something behind the Church, which, as we know it, is the creation not only of the original impulse of Jesus, but of a thousand influences rooted in social life, in moral discipline, and political administration; for it was reared upon the Roman Empire as well as on faith, hope, and love. And if it be sought to baptise this interior energy by a name, we have but to ask the first teachers, when their Master was no more, to find that they testify to one great fact. Around them are mysterious forces greater than they know. The power and the wisdom of God have been revealed in Jesus. In him is something more than a sum of truths, or a code of rules. He is not only a greater Moses proclaiming a new commandment; he is the channel of fresh moral and spiritual might. The Christianity of the early Church was not, like Judaism, a discipline founded upon a law; nor was it, like Hellenism, a philosophy of religion; it was the vivid expression of an inner quickening. To share that quickening was like rising from the grave. It was to put off the old man and put on the new. It was to be born from above, to pass out of death into another world of light and love; and Christianity, not as an abstract teaching, or a great historic generalisation, but as a personal experience, is gathered into one word—Life.

The New World of Modern Thought.

The spiritual life of the present day is far more complex than was possible for the first disciples. That noble emotion by which we have access to what we call the infinite, that energy, on the one hand of endeavour, and on the other of trust, which brings us into fellowship with the holy Spirit, is fed from many sources, and cannot be concentrated under any single name. It is enriched by innumerable influences from those who have learned of Jesus the way into the sanctuary of peace, and have in their measure also overcome the world. But it has expanded in presence of a scene incalculably vaster and more intricate than that which offered itself to the apostolic thought. The world of modern knowledge to which the historian or the astronomer introduces us, fills time and space in a manner of which the early Church had no idea. The kingdom of science has been established in our midst, and in this realm likewise the access to the higher mysteries is possible only to the spirit of the little child. No less is this true of the world of poetry and art, where the symbols of imagination dwell beyond sight and touch, and are intelligible on their religious side only to the earnest heart and pure. It is the same with other products of our human activity. The forces of sympathy which the last century has evoked, the passion for social justice, the immense conceptions of order and progress applied to the welfare and harmony of nations all around the globe, the sense of purpose on a scale beyond our most colossal dreams implied in the idea of evolution—through all these men find a ministry of life. They are carried out of themselves on mighty tides of thought, feeling, action, and they learn to live. Such life has its tremendous temptations, its appalling dangers, its tragic incidents of wreck and ruin. Its excitements, its intensity, its degradation, may prove, as the literature and politics of the last few years have shown us (need I name Nietzsche or Cecil Rhodes?), too great a strain for our frail mortal powers. But to none of these things can religion be indifferent. It was the ideal of the Middle Ages to bring all the functions and powers of man into her service. The creations of law and government, the investigations of knowledge, the reasonings of philosophy, the visions of seers, the harmonies of song, were all alike summoned to consecrate themselves to faith. Each opened on one side to the infinite, and each was bidden along that avenue to bring men to God. The great mediæval thinkers sought to co-ordinate all human powers beneath the sublime control of God's sovereignty and love. To that high aim we are returning now.

The New Spirit of Religion.

We have witnessed in the last century a mighty movement setting religion free. Traditional doctrines of authority have been shaken. Far-reaching changes have taken place. The world, if I may say so, has been restored to God, God to the world. Nature is no longer dead, it thrills with his energy, it embodies his ideas. The long vistas of history are not dark or silent, as if through Israel only ran a line of light, and all outside lay swathed in gloom; through the round earth the preparations of wisdom have been ceaselessly going on, and in intelligence, in conscience, and affection, the divine education of the race is the perpetual witness of the living God. Beneath this trust life is arising into new dignity. It is no longer petty or provincial. Even now in the actual present it is knit with the eternal. The scene of our existence is itself divine, and to respond to its perpetual challenge, "Come, know me, study me, understand me, work with me," is to approach one shrine in the great temple of immensity. The "Church of the living God," therefore, as we conceive it now, must have a place for every higher aspect of man's spirit. It must keep its doors hospitably open to all the influences through which the Unseen Father trains our thought, and guides our endeavours, and invites our faith. It calls us still to be fellow-workers with him; and it declares to us anew, in the dear language of his chosen of old, that we are the heirs of his purpose, the sons of his love.

New Life in the Churches.

This mighty quickening has passed through our land. All Churches have in some form or other felt its touch. There may, indeed, be echoes of theologic strife and traces of vulgar competition among the records of the last half century; they are not wholly unknown even to-day. But who that reads the history of the Victorian Age will doubt that on the whole the religious life of England now is richer and deeper, stronger and broader far than it was fifty, or even thirty years ago. What a new note is sounded in Lux Mundi compared with that of Essays and Reviews!

Are we True to this High Calling?

And what, in all this varied movement, what of our homes of faith and prayer? Much quiet labour, much simple piety, much strenuous goodness, lie enshrined within them, the memory of which can never fade from our hearts. Great teachers have been with us who have shed knowledge and insight over difficult problems. By their guidance we have shaped anew the whole fabric of our trust, and planted its foundations deep within the soul. Yet must we not ask ourselves if we have risen to the height of our great calling. We have been summoned along the upward way. Has the heavenly voice really moved us, and how far have we advanced? Around us are many signs of active life. The stir and quickening of common endeavour call for our courage, and bid us be of good cheer. But if languor oppresses us, and divisions weaken, and we bewail our spiritual ineffectiveness among ourselves, while friendly observers prophesy a slow decline, and perhaps at last a painless extinction, were it not well frankly to confess our failure, patiently to seek out its cause, and humbly ask fresh strength in our infirmity, as we rouse ourselves for worthier service? Bear with me, fathers and brethren of this Conference, if I offer some thoughts on these matters.

Our churches exist to nurture and maintain our spiritual life. Is it not the case that we sometimes forget this high function? Do we not often choose some easier task, give prominence to some lesser element, or erect an indispensable condition into the very aim and object of our being? We proclaim our liberty, and even boast that we are not as those that are bound. Yet we do not unite in order to be free.

There is no reason why we should come together that we may then have equal opportunity to separate. Freedom is, indeed, the cherished guardian of our teaching and our worship; its absence may check life; its presence has always stimulated it—until it is in its turn converted into a stifling tradition, or perhaps into an excuse for doing nothing. But the sources of life are not within its keeping. These lie in mysteries of trust and prayer, and are only open to the lowly and loving heart. Nor does our true union lie in community of doctrine or identity of belief. Once more we are in danger of mistaking the adjunct for the essence; once more it is easy to lay the emphasis on the wrong place. Spiritual sympathy there must be among those who would join together in common worship; and spiritual sympathy will again and again express itself in doctrinal agreement. But community of belief, though it may be a constant element in our association, is once more not its cause, still less its end. The members of a family are not united because they bear a common name; nor is fellowship in a Church to be determined by a theological label.

The Secret of True Life in the Church.

The only basis for our religious union is a share in the same spirit. The household of God must needs include every type of mind and heart; and those who are quickened by the same sympathies, who cherish the same outlook on life, who kneel with the same reverence and are uplifted with the same joy, will seek each other out, will clasp each other's hands for mutual strength, and go forwards along the same path of duty and faith. But we do not always realise that we are thus pledged to serious things. To join even the lowliest congregation that aspires to belong to the Church of the living God, involves high aims and grave obligations. The life of religion is no easy promenade or fair-weather exercise. In such association each must bear his part. The worship of the Church must be a common act, where the spiritual resources of all are brought to the help of each. I know, indeed, what difficulty often besets our utterance. I know with what reserve we guard the secrets of our hearts. I know the dread lest we should seem to spy upon each other's mysteries, and intrude on the solemnity of souls that converse with God. Yet is it not a part of our weakness that our practice of worship (whatever our theory may be) almost always throws its whole burden and strain upon one man? We do not utilise our own resources. We do not dare even to ask each other to read the Scriptures, in which we find a common source of edification. What voice save the minister's is ever raised in prayer? He cannot nurture who himself is not fed; nor can the minister sustain others even with the help of a printed page, if those for whom he labours are not there to bear him up with at least the silent uplifting of a united devotion. Too long has the weight of convention like a numbing frost laid its dull burden on us. Too long have we failed to strive towards our ideal. We have declared that the divine Spirit is in no man's keeping, and we have claimed it in all its perfection from the preacher at £200 a year. We have maintained the open access of all souls everywhere and always to the Father's grace, and we have ceased to cherish the dear intimacies of worship in our homes. We are proud of having added to the music of the Church Universal some strains of sacred song which the next generations will not willingly let die; but too often our own voices are silent, and the rapture that enkindles others leaves our own hearts unmoved. And yet day by day and hour by hour we are in this mansion of the Father's house. The seasons of the year fail not. The bounty of the world, its beauty, its wonder, make to us their perpetual appeal; or its hardness rouses us to courage, and we are called to find our way through difficulty to peace. The vicissitudes of happiness and grief await us. Temptation has us in its deadly grip. What shall harmonise these manifold aspects of our life, what shall give us love for the unlovely, joy in the very heart of pain, calm in the strenuous wrestle with evil, save that "mind of the Spirit" which is eternal life? O let us put off our sloth, awake from our hesitations, rise above our mistrusts, and take our share in the light, the support, the creative gladness, of the infinite and everlasting God.

Forms of Faithfulness in the Church.

But life needs forms through which to express itself. Without them it remains vague and ineffective. It is in danger of dispersion and decay; it must be organised, or its vital energies will lack sustenance and run to waste. And it is the duty of the Church to see that such forms shall be adequate and noble. They will have their intellectual side as we try to bring our statements of religious truth into harmony with the best fruits of knowledge. With the difficulties which this involves we are most of us familiar. There are some which necessarily pertain to the subject itself; there are others which rise from opposite causes, the indifference which proclaims doctrine to be insignificant compared with conduct and character, and the partisanship which converts it into a flag of warfare and the battle cry of a sect. For my part I am convinced that there are aspects of Christian truth which it is our duty continually to enforce. To bear testimony to what is, in the august relations of the soul to God, must always be a high and solemn task. To throw into the clearest forms we can our conceptions of life, its meaning and its destiny—to vindicate our faith in God's mighty purpose for the world—to unfold the spiritual significance of our interpretation of historic Christianity—to press great thoughts and worthy ideas upon the young for their guidance and encouragement—to offer them to the doubter and the estranged as the solution of difficulty and the way of return to peace—these must always be the functions of the teacher, and the Church that neglects them will be in grave peril of sterility and decline. The provision of adequate intellectual forms of religious truth must never be ignored; for it is on truth in the last resort that our whole conception of religion depends. If we cannot make it good in fact, if we cannot invest it with reality, we shall appeal in vain to emotion which has ceased to be able to justify itself, and the inner forces of faith will fade and die.

But I know also that this is not our hardest task. The travelling lecturer who is welcomed from town to town receives gifts of sympathy and assurance of appreciation often denied to the lonely minister in solitary outposts of duty, who must face exclusion without public applause, and keep a heart of courage when zeal languishes and novelty attracts his people otherwhere. For we need also worthy forms for our moral energy. The record of our churches is not without its share of faithful labour and fine achievement. The men of the last century have been well known for lofty principle and for generous public spirit. They have been conspicuous for service at the council board, in the hospital, the college, and the school. In this city a splendid tradition, illuminated by many a distinguished name, such as those of a Roscoe, a Holt, a Rathbone, preserves their memory and animates their successors.*

To Seek and to Save Them that are Lost.

Yet there are whole branches of Christian effort in which we have taken little or no part. We have done something to educate; have we tried to redeem? We have taken youth, we have sought to develop intelligence, to mould the forces of character; we have striven to inspire principles and instil right aims. How far have we succeeded in rescuing the lost? Nay, rather, how far have we tried? Even in our Domestic Missions,† their very success in uplifting whole families out of an environment of vice or misery has sometimes diverted them from the work of deliverance into that of sustaining the delivered, and we have forgotten that as soon as we have saved a man we should make him, in his turn, a saviour. We have not fathomed the deeps of degradation and sin. We have had but scant sympathy with the tempted, the weak, the dissolute; we have shrunk from grappling with the waif and the criminal. Let others follow the drum and trumpet of the Salvation Army; only one here and there among us has the spiritual passion to win souls from hell. A few years ago a little home maintained in London for the recovery of the wandering sisters of the street was closed, not indeed for want of means—money for a good cause, thank God, is never lacking—but for the far graver need of a woman of sympathy, insight, and power, to give her life to restore the fallen. But these and such tasks are the Churches' work. If they do not take their share in the warfare with sin, they may present the attractions of literature, or invite to the pastimes of society, but the spirit that has been touched by Jesus will seek austerer

* In his last volume on "Life and Labour of the People in London" (Third Series, "Religious Influences, VII., Summary, p. 145) Mr. Charles Booth remarks:—"Unitarians, though impaired as religious critics by a certain narrowness of spiritual sympathy, are quite invaluable as leaders in social work." It must be added that he finds it necessary to continue:—"By the orthodox their teaching is regarded, somewhat arbitrarily, as a negation, and we hear it said that 'you cannot win on a negation'; but, however regarded, it does seem as though the Unitarian view of the spiritual world in its relation to man awoke little response in the human soul; comparing in this respect unfavourably with even the most extravagant assertions of any African medicine man."

toil; and the young, in whom lies the hope of the future, will turn to nobler ideals elsewhere.

New Problems of the Kingdom.

And, once more, in the background are large questions looming obscure and vast, concerning the future of our social order, and the transformations which new ideas of justice may gradually demand. How shall we prepare to meet them? With what spirit shall we listen to them? Is the Church to welcome or oppose them? Can it stand aloof indifferent? It cannot undertake the functions of scientific inquiry, or of philosophic thought; and without these aids no progress will (in my judgment at least) be possible. But it can make ready the hearts of men for the needful sacrifice. It can lift them above prejudice, it can moderate passion and inspire goodwill. Above all, it can quicken the enthusiasm needful for tasks of administrative drudgery, of laborious inquiry and detailed observation; it can save men from the desolating suspicion in which effort dies—namely, that the work is too great for them; it can convince us that what the Father calls on us to do—to make the world of modern industry and politics a fitting scene for the life of the sons of God—he has not set it out of our power to do. The kingdom of heaven must always, it is true, lie beyond our sight; and yet we need not wait for one to say "Lo there!"; to the disciple of Jesus it is always in our midst.

What shall we say to these Things?

And we, brethren, few and scattered, buffeted and weak, as we confront these things, what answer can we make? Who is sufficient for them? Can we make the daring answer "Our sufficiency is of God"? What is our sufficiency? Again and again we have been driven into exclusion and solitude. Yearning for the fellowship of the Church Universal, we have been converted, no matter how loud our protest, into a sect. Against the restraints, the limitations, the prejudices, which sectarianism inevitably involves, voices of living prophecy, as of the holy dead, utter impassioned warning. Yet it is conceded that "organisation by scheme of men" may be lawful "in the necessary way of combining the efforts and means of men for particular efficiency." It is to promote the efficiency of our churches, and of all who will join us in common service of God and man, that we meet this day. There are strong and there are weak among us, and we seek to bring the help of the strong to the aid of the weak. I know the dire might of temptation, the desire to be powerful, the longing to be reckoned among the forces of the land, the pride of contributing to the new order something to which men in coming time may point and say, "This was their work." I know the contrast between dream and reality, the peril of nursing vain ambitions, and waiting for others to translate them into fact. To be foremost in service, and yet to be full of meekness; to be strenuous against wrong, and yet cherish the lowly heart; to face the world in protest, and yet maintain the self-forgetting spirit—to these paradoxes of the religious life are we bidden.

With New Faith and Hope, Renewed Consecration.

Since we last met we have left a century behind, and we have passed out of one of the most exciting periods in all history. What do we carry over into the new age? Alarms, divisions, fears, jealousies, disputes? Nay, rather, let us say, what wider outlook on the world, what ancient trust enlarged by fresh experience, what faiths long-tried expanded and confirmed, what hopes implanted in us with undying strength, what love—ah! brethren, dare we say it?—of God and man hallowed anew by the resurrection of the Christian spirit in our midst! The influences which will feed the religion of the future are not ours to guide or to control. They lie deeper than the wells we dig. They will arise out of the new conviction which is slowly being born within us of the mystic and pervading unity in which we live; out of the cohesive might of great ethical principles through which the thought and purpose of God are manifested to us; out of the nobler ideals of human relations in which democracy is gradually learning to express itself; out of the sympathies begotten through liberty and brotherhood which the conceptions of Jesus, revivified in modern forms, awake within us. This movement will be slow to take definite shape, but I am convinced that it has started, it is gathering its forces, it is on the way, it will find prophetic heralds and arrive. We cannot foresee what changes it will bring in the great organised Churches now bound to specific interpretations of the Christian tradition. Nor can we discern our own position towards them. But mighty changes there must be, and of one thing I am deeply persuaded. The Kingdom of God, as it will be apprehended by the Christianity of the coming century will be more social, and the call will sound the loudest in the ears of those who are now privileged and leisured. Can we prepare ourselves by openness of mind, by fervour of spirit, by patience of service and reality of love, for the sacrifices which it will inevitably demand?

Ah, brethren, the time is great. It is big with unknown purpose, it is full of hope and joy. The forces of the spring are all around us. The whole land thrills with the glorious awakening of the year. The woods unbind their tresses, and the boughs so lately bare are green; the groves are vocal with the song of birds; the waiting earth prepares with faithfulness to complete her perfect work; the blade already promises the ear, the blossoms prophesy the ripened fruit. Shall we alone remain inert and dull? Let us arise from the winter of our discontent. We are summoned to go forward into the Church of the living God. There is a fellowship for ever open; and though we fail, yet by his grace we may still lay our offering on the altar with the lowly trust that he will not ask of us, "Have you succeeded?" but only, "Have you given me of your best?"

WEDNESDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

On Wednesday morning, at ten o'clock, Communion Service was held in Hope-street Church, conducted by the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson and H. Shaen Solly, the opening hymn, instinct with the spirit of that service, being Dean Stanley's, "When the Paschal evening fell."

Mr. Dowson gave the address, and spoke of the ministry of Jesus, recalling especially the last pathetic scenes and the victory of his death. The ministers who helped in the distribution were the Revs. H. Gow, L. P. Jacks, E. I. Fripp, and Joseph Anderton.

At the morning session in St. George's Hall, an address was given by the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of the King's Weigh House Congregational Church, London, on "A Worshipful Church," which we must reserve for publication next week.

A vote of thanks to Dr. Hunter, which was carried with the utmost cordiality, was moved by Alderman W. B. Bowring, of Liverpool, in the absence of the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, who was unable to be present. In a letter of regret for his absence Dr. Drummond expressed the hope that the meetings of the Conference would result in a deepening of the spiritual life of the Churches, and a strengthening of the fraternal bond which unites their members together.

Mr. Harry Rawson, J.P., was in the chair.

After luncheon the chair was taken by the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, D.Sc., when papers on "The Pastoral Ideal" were read by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, B.A., of Belfast, and Mr. James Graham, of Glasgow.

THE PASTORAL IDEAL.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM HAMILTON DRUMMOND, B.A.

The subject of this paper is the Pastoral Ideal of the Christian Ministry. It is a subject which has little to do with speculative thought, or the new theology or the high politics of organisation. It is also a subject upon which it is very difficult to say anything striking or original. And yet no apology can be needed for an attempt to reconsider it in the light of the needs and difficulties of our own time. In the drift of doctrine and religious habit, which is making our work so difficult, we are exposed to a two-fold danger. We may on the one hand cling too long and too obstinately to traditional methods of activity, which have become quite ineffective for any practical end; or we may be too ready to relinquish our inherited ideals of the scope and purpose of Christian work, because they are attacked by criticism or need some readjustment, in particulars rather than in essentials, to meet the changed conditions of modern life.

"Your ministry," says Jeremy Taylor, in one of his Visitation Charges, "must be so conducted that . . . all sorts of gainsayers may see that you intend God's glory and the good of souls." Is this idea of the ministry as a cure of souls, and of the dominating passion of the minister's life as a desire for the good of souls, suffering a decline? The very language in which the question is asked has a flavour of antiquity. The great treatises on the pastoral care, like Baxter's "Gildas Salvianus," or Taylor's "Ductor Dubitantium" are not of our day, and even the rare charm of George Herbert's "Country Parson" pleases us chiefly for its forgotten simplicity. But still the idea lingers, at least as a tradition of what should be expected of the minister who does his duty; and the charge that we do not visit is always ready at hand to rebuke our indolence, or to account for our failures. I do not resent this in any way. There is, unfortunately, no profession where the temptations to some forms of idleness and self-indulgence are greater and scamped work is passed over so lightly. But do the people who make this charge desire, as a rule, to see a real recovery of the pastoral ideal? Are they prepared to give the minister opportunities for true spiritual work in their own homes, or do they limit their ideas to ordinary social intercourse for themselves, while the poor may have occasional prayers for the sick and some plain speech about their sins? Do not think that I speak in mockery. This growing difference of attitude in our relation to the rich and the poor has often caused me searching of heart. In a mixed congregation of people with marked grades of wealth and education it produces a sense of cleavage in our religious work. I have had many exceptions in my own experience, but the fact remains that it is easier to be a pastor to people who live in small houses, to plead with the conscience, to rebuke open sin, to appeal to the deepest motives, and to have frank human speech upon the things of God and the soul; and I do not think that it is right that it should be so.

Visiting and Pastoral Work.

To a large extent visiting and pastoral work are regarded as convertible terms. Constant and regular visitation is simply a means to an end, and the question of its value depends entirely upon the man who does it and the motive which inspires him. The idea is, I think, very prevalent that visiting is a fairly effective method of getting people to come to church, and the good pastor is the man who is zealous and punctual in looking up the Sunday absentees. If, however, the preacher is clever and the service attractive the church may be strong enough to do without it, and there is a great saving of energy and time. In this way pastoral work comes to be regarded as the prop of the weak or second-rate man, while pulpit oratory which does not depend upon it for success is the hall-mark of ministerial ability.

Ministers themselves are largely responsible for this popular depreciation of an essential and most sacred part of their office. We allow ourselves to despise visiting. We tell our people, quite unabashed, that they must not expect it from us. We even take credit to ourselves upon occasion because we have no taste for it, or are too much engrossed in more important affairs to find time to attend to it. Our aim is to be preachers, and all our strength must go to that; or we have gifts for the platform and the Press and we are soon immersed in these public activities. And so between these two ambitions the desire to be faithful pastors of Christ's flock is crushed out as between the upper and the nether millstone.

The Pastor's Duty.

Is it not time for some revision of judgment upon this matter? Should we not be wise to refuse to let the pastoral side of the ministry go by default amid the rush of city life and the competitive claims of rival religious organisations and their committees, without some serious effort at least to understand what it is we may be losing? May not many of our occupations, when we look at life sub specie æternitatis—in the light of the Eternal, be intrinsically quite unimportant compared with this patient and faithful dealing with individual souls?

For this is what the work of the pastor is in its essence. Visitation is simply a means, it provides the opportunity for this end. Even if we look upon it as a practical method of getting people to church, the object is something different from the low one of self-congratulation when we see a crowd or obtain a good place in the religious census. It is spiritual, that the soul may be helped. But public worship is only one of the ways in which the minister should be a helper of human souls. There he is dealing with them in crowds. It is common prayer, and the word of life is spoken, not to this man or woman, but to the general heart of humanity. Christ did this work, and those who speak in his name must always continue to do it with kindled imagination, and, if the grace be given, with prophetic fire. But he dealt also with the individual soul in its private sorrow and special temptation, in its moods both of penitence and rejoicing, and if it is our aim to work along his special line of influence, we must try to follow him in this with at least as much zeal as we give to the preaching of sermons.

As Man to Man.

Here, then, is our answer to every sceptical inquiry about the use of visiting; it may be nothing in itself, but it provides the opportunity for the faithful exercise of our pastoral care. I know that we cannot go as formal religious teachers. We shall probably spoil all the good we have at heart if we do. There is much less outward respect for our office than there used to be, and in consequence we require increased tact and delicacy of feeling in all private and personal relations with our people. In some houses our visits seem never to go beyond outward sociability, but it is often through these apparently trivial relationships that the way is opened for the word of comfort and strength in some crisis of the soul's life. It is, however, very easy on both sides to be satisfied with friendly chat and agreeable manners, and gossip not always quite harmless about other members of the congregation. We may, in fact, know a great deal about our people without really knowing them; and we may be quite friendly without coming at all near to being the spiritual friend we ought to be.

With Thoughtful Care and Serious Devotion.

It is clear that work which is at once so delicate as this of the pastoral care, and at the same time so essential to any true ideal of the Christian ministry, should not be left to the happy accidents of varying tastes and moods. It is not work which will take care of itself. It is not so much talked about as preaching, and it does not lend itself to methods of advertisement. But it requires thought, system, diligence and gifts of heart and brain as great as those of the preacher. Many of us are the victims of conventional ideas of the minister's life and the arrangement of his time. We are inclined to think of the hours in the study over the latest book on philosophy or New Testament criticism as more sacred than the hours in the homes of the people. It is so easy, and so false, to measure our work as ministers of the living grace of God by the amount of our reading. Then there are the claims of business and public work and meetings of societies; and it is only the remaining scraps of time, often with a tired brain, which we can give to pastoral work. Is it any wonder, when we treat it in this way, that our faith in it dwindles? If it is to be effective we must enthrone it in our hearts as among the most sacred trusts of our calling, and dedicate to it our freshest thought and our choicest hours; and furthermore, we must adapt our own habits to the needs and opportunities and the special circumstances by which we are surrounded. The men of the Church are not to be shut out from our friendship because they are at business all day, and we ministers prefer to spend our evenings at home.

The Clergy as Teachers.

Perhaps you will allow me to refer, just in a parenthesis, to one other department of pastoral duty. There is no time to enlarge upon it, but I cannot pass it on in silence, especially as for some years it has seemed to me one of great practical importance. The clergy are a body of teachers. They ought to give a great deal of their thought and time to teaching. And yet I doubt whether any teaching at the present time is so wanting in method and thoroughness as that which is given by the clergy of all denominations. It ought to be the teaching of trained men, and it has all the ineffectiveness of the amateur. For all departments of secular knowledge and in every class of school the art of teaching has become a subject for prolonged study and severe discipline. Is it safe or altogether creditable that every year the ranks of the professed teachers of religion are recruited by men who have never been taught even the elements of their art? I should like to see every man who is appointed to a pastorate put through the same kind of training as is in force for the teachers in secondary schools. I know the difficulty of adding more to the multifarious studies of the Divinity school; but the time may not be far distant when it will become necessary, if we are to keep abreast of the real needs and interests of men, to treat some subjects as belonging to what Lord Rosebery has called "the learning of the dead." I will not provoke unnecessary controversy by trying to specify what might be included under this title; but I am inclined to think that if I had to take my choice I should be willing to sacrifice the religion of the South Sea Islanders or even some of the heresies of the fourth century for real training in the best methods of teaching the New Testament and the elements of religious knowledge to children. Ladies and gentlemen, my plea is for a wide recognition of teaching as part of the pastoral ideal; and if the teaching is to be effective under modern educational conditions, it must have the method and the happy art which, except for the richly gifted, are the fruit of special knowledge and training.

The Layman's Part.

I hope that the paper which is to follow, and which will present this subject to you from the layman's point of view, will deal with the responsibilities of the laity in encouraging a high standard of ministerial loyalty to the pastoral ideal. The ministry is to a large extent what you make it. If you want it to be one of real religious power a little earnest sympathy will do more than volumes of criticism. Let your own minister feel that you take a personal interest in the spiritual aspects of his work. Make him realise that you care deeply for the quiet unnoticed labours of the week, and that the fellowship of the church goes with him in his visits of comfort and his struggles with sin. Above all give him opportunities in your own home, with your young people. Let him share from time to time the more sacred aspects, it may be the the burdens and sorrows of your family life.

If I may venture upon one other word in this privileged field of lay duty, it shall be this. Refuse to become a victim to the modern idolatry of the popular preacher. Remember that two or three sermons are but a poor test of a minister's gift. Look into his record, and try to judge him at least as much by his capacity for the whole duty of his calling as by his power of pleasing you upon two consecutive Sunday mornings. It is not always the preacher who pleases first who wears best. You may discover when it is too late that he has no gift for high and helpful friendship with his people. You wanted a minister and you have only got a Sunday speaker.

Pastor and Preacher.

It must be obvious from what I have said already, that I have no sympathy with the fashionable opposition between the preacher and the pastor. In my own experience it does not exist; and I believe that for other average men it is equally false. There are in the Nonconformist churches a few exceptional preachers who may be set apart, like the canons at St. Paul's or Westminster Abbey, to speak to the great congregation with whom they have no personal tie. There are also men of large humanity but slow of speech, who are born to be pastors. But the rule should be for one man to fill the double office. There are some large churches where it must be very difficult for the minister to exercise personal oversight and friendship. Possibly in these cases the congregation loses more than can ever be gained by the enthusiasm of numbers alone. But in none of our churches is the minister embarrassed by numbers. We cannot plead that we are too busy to overtake our work. We have time enough and to spare to read and to think, to preach and to visit, and to give ourselves without stint to the long hours of patient dealing with individual sorrows and temptations, in which the minister finds the deepest happiness of his life.

With closer faithfulness to the pastoral ideal I believe that most of us would gain much in pulpit power. Our preaching would be enriched by just those qualities in which some of our kindliest critics tell us we are most lacking. It might be less literary, but it would strike closer home, because it would be more searching, human and personal.

It would be an act of presumption for one who is at the meridian to speak a word of exhortation to an assembly where so many of the fathers of the faith are gathered, rich in the wisdom of years, richer still in the garnered wealth of their ministry. Let me turn for a moment to my contemporaries, and to those who are younger in experience than myself. To them I would say, in the words of that Prince of Pastors Richard Baxter, "Brethren, if saving souls be your end, you will certainly intend it as well out of the pulpit as in it."

THE PASTORAL IDEAL.

BY MR. JAMES GRAHAM.

At first glance it may be supposed that this subject of the Pastoral Ideal is not of any special importance, having reference merely to the duties of the clergy; but a very little consideration will, we think, convince everyone that it really involves issues of the greatest consequence. For, of course, the question instantly arises, what are the duties of the Pastor?—and that leads, at once, to the further inquiry, what is the purpose of the Church? And in the endeavour to furnish a proper reply to these questions we are confronted with some of the profoundest problems of human life. It is our intention, however, to avoid all uncertainty, or obscurity; and we therefore begin by assuming as little as possible. Whatever has been the history of the world in the past, or the conditions out of which the vision of this real present has arisen, one point seems clear—we are all of us struggling from the lower to the higher—from the imperfect towards the more and more perfect. A great spirit of progress is calling us into higher reaches of beauty and power; and he is doing good work who carries himself or others but one step forward in that upward path. That is the foundation on which we build. This great movement towards an ideal universally acknowledged demands leaders. We require leaders in business, in manufactures, in Science and in Art. But there is even a higher level than all this. All material possessions, and even the intellect itself, with the wide range of knowledge which it reveals, is only a means, and that which determines the end for which all these means ought to be used has its source in what we call the will; and in that profound realm of our being—whence issue all the thoughts and intents of the heart—into which the will ushers us. This central power—this spring of life—also requires education; and to assist human souls in this work is the need which the Pastor exists to supply. For it is clearly of the first importance that the consciousness of man be trained in sensitiveness until it responds to motives of the highest excellence, and developed in power until it becomes intense enough to overcome all lower tendencies. Without this, all other education is worse than ignorance, for it is knowledge misused. To help the world then to rise to the highest form of consciousness that is possible to it is the function of the Church and the work to which the Pastor must devote himself. Thus we base the Pastoral Ideal not on the desire for a culture or polish that can be dispensed with, but on what is undoubtedly the very end and prime necessity of human progress—the possession of a noble and vigorous spirit—a spirit that shall give meaning to all the facts, and purpose to all the forces, of existence.

The Pastor as Poet.

As to the qualifications for the Pastoral office, we may find not a few—and these well able to judge—who declare that every spiritual teacher should be a poet. If by a poet is meant, not a mere writer of verses, but one who, like Wordsworth, "sees into the life of things," then undoubtedly the statement is correct.

> The world is full of glorious likenesses;
> The Poet's power is to sort these out,
> And to make music from the common strings
> With which the world is strung; to make the dumb
> Earth utter heavenly harmony, and draw
> Life clear, and sweet, and harmless as spring water,
> Welling its way through flowers.

If that be a truthful description, then the Pastor must indeed be a poet. While others may live upon the surface, and amidst the discords of life, he will penetrate into the interior meanings; and as a consequence, his thought will be living and musical. But his main qualification must, we think, be something even more general and indispensable than the poetic gift.

Life must quicken Life—Working in Love.

Starting from the principle that we have laid down—that the work of the Pastor is by direct dealing with the human spirit to draw from it all its latent wealth—it becomes clear that the first requisite for such a work must be the possession in himself, in some considerable measure, of that higher form of consciousness which he aspires to kindle in others. And what is this higher form of consciousness? Briefly, it is the perception that no individual is complete in himself; "no man liveth to himself": only through other souls can each be realised. We are like those little squares that children play with; when taken alone each is but a section; but when pieced together, the whole forms a consistent picture. So, we individuals in isolation are but fragments; bring us together in a fellowship, each supplying the need of the other, and a divine idea takes possession of us. Our lives are enriched. In a word this higher consciousness is love; and love of souls is the first qualification for Pastoral work. Whatever he may be, or not be, the Pastor must be one who can say, with Abu-Ben-Adem, "Write me as one who loves his fellowmen." The possession of this power, even in a slight degree, implies a great deal. It gives what the Apostle calls, "eyes of the heart." In other words, it involves the sense of what we have just called the divine idea; and the consequent perception of the real value of man. Professor Royce has lately been telling us in the Hibbert Journal that it is of the very nature of the Infinite to be self-representative. This being the case, every human soul may be regarded as an embodiment of that Infinite, breathing forth something of its mystery and perfection. Love makes this thought conscious knowledge; it becomes so when we, by sympathy, put ourselves in the place of others, and see them not as they are in their present attainment, but as the Eternal would have them be. In this region Jesus must have lived. Hence his call to the weary and heavy laden, and hence, too, those wonderful words of his—"The kingdom of heaven is within you—the kingdom of heaven is like unto a grain of mustard seed."

Marvellous thought! Every soul a seed of heaven, having within it all the promise and potency of a divine creation! It was this Spirit, surely, that made him a Healer and a Liberator, and led him to adopt as his own the words of the ancient Prophetic Manifesto—"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are oppressed. To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord." Whoever, in these days, is conscious of the same call to do good has entered on the life of the Spirit, and may, if other conditions are favourable, make his vocation the Ministry of the Spirit.

The Pastor's Two-fold Message.

The message, or Gospel, which the Pastor has to deliver to his people naturally divides itself into two parts: first, the practical or living experience of the spiritual life; and second, the thoughts and reflections concerning that life as pictured in self-consciousness. The living experience to be communicated we have already tried to exhibit. It is the immediate sense of that Divine revelation which is being expressed in Nature and Man. It is justice.

> Oh! sometimes gleams upon our sight,
> Through present wrong the Eternal right.

It is beauty, all beauty, from the grace of the bending lily to the beauty of holiness. It is sacrifice, for the highest life consists in self-surrender; and it is joy, for self-surrender means love, and joy is just the sense of the loveliness in which love clothes itself.

Teaching through Life.

The Pastor is an Artist in human life; and his work is to endeavour to communicate these graces, in the first place, and not simply to philosophise about them. How shall he do it? First by giving his own life the fullest self-expression. He must glory in his own experience, and he must exhibit his own ideals, showing how they attract him, how they uplift and satisfy all human aspirations. Then he will deal largely in illustrations, and he will find his illustrations in common life; the captain who remains at his post faithful to the last; the miner who rejects the opportunity to escape from danger, saying to his mate—"You go up now; I will run back and warn the others." Or he will find ideal cases in literature, such as Tennyson's poem of "Enoch Arden," where is pictured a self-sacrifice to which all hearts must respond in admiration and love. And again, he will refer to all the great saints and heroes of the past, not to criticise mainly, but to let them speak out the life that is in them. Jesus, the Christ, with his wonderful parables, and splendid insight, and marvellous self-forgetting love. The Pastor will hold him up to the world that all the virtue of his gracious personality may go forth from him "to heal the wounds that sin hath made"; and to kindle the same healing power in others. And Gautama, the Buddha, with his law of renunciation and gospel of self-mastery.

> I, Buddh, who wept with all my brothers' tears,
> Whose heart was broken by a whole world's woe,
> Laugh and am glad, for there is Liberty!
> Ho! ye who suffer, know
> Ye suffer from yourselves!

And coming down to ordinary affairs, he will deal with common human life; he will find his material in the familiar experience of the home; he will speak of temptation, of struggle and victory, of pain and sickness, bereavement and death, of loneliness and disappointment, of sacred friendships, and of the dull monotony of the daily task; and out of it all he will draw—"Life clear, and sweet, and harmless as spring-water, welling its way through flowers"; for he will show that it all results, or ought to result, in a deepening sense of that life in the Spirit which sets us in "the eternal ecstasy of God's great jubilee."

Teaching of the Past—Present Inspiration.

In carrying out his purpose the Pastor ought to take full advantage of the records of the past. All living experience is kindling, and the experience of the past is not dead; at least it can be "resurrected" and made to live again in us. The Bibles of olden times are a perfect storehouse of such experience. They might even be called the spiritual coalfields of the world. Apply to these records something of the same fire that is latent in them, and they give an inspiration that is almost inexhaustible. It is grand to find that great souls thousands of years ago shared in the same life as we do to-day. Of course there is in these records a temporary element, but that is a genuine advantage for our purpose. A material which was all combustible would not yield a useful fire, but might result in an explosion; and so also a record that was infallibly true would supply no opportunity for the exercise of that individual discrimination which is the very means whereby we can apply the spiritual energy which any record may contain. It is wise, we think, frequently to de-magnetise the old words by paraphrasing or by explanation. Sometimes a slight change of this kind will give wonderful significance to what is obscure. In any case we feel certain that the highest value of all spiritual records comes to those who recognise the inspiration of the writer and the reader to be of the same character.

The True Worship.

Any reference to the Pastoral Ideal which failed to take account of the subject of worship would be radically imperfect. All that we have said implies that the human spirit is in touch with a life that mingles with, and yet transcends, its own: a life so beautiful, so holy, and carrying with it such a sense of sacred obligation, that before the vision of its sanctity men will give up their most cherished desires, and find joy in the surrender. To feel thus is to worship. Unfortunately, in popular opinion only that is worship which is formal and official. Popular opinion is entirely wrong. Pure worship is in the Spirit: when anyone reveres the moral law, and gives up the slightest personal desire in order that justice be done, he has entered the real sanctuary. This sense of spiritual communion the Pastor will cultivate in himself and in his people. In the Spirit all men live and move and have their being, and yet most people know it not, for they are in the position of those whom Wordsworth describes as "moving about in worlds not realised." How shall these worlds be made real to us? That is the secret of personal communion with the Highest. It is first by standing still amidst the hurry and turmoil of life and considering—by trying to realise for a time what we are and where we are. Here is a flower—what is it? If we think simply and persistently we will conclude that it is a gift from the Spirit, sent down to us through the ages.

> The tiniest eye-bud, peeping from the sod,
> Touched with the living thought—the spirit wand,
> It opens unto God.

And this is not an exceptional case. It is an illustration of what is true through all being.

Constant Spirit of Devotion.

Every fact opens unto God, when we bring the living thought to bear upon it. When this is realised by us in some little measure, communion is found to be, not so much a department of life as life itself. Into this great deep the Pastor himself will retire, and he will advise his people to follow his example. It will wash away all the stains and heat of worry and competition; it will bring great visions of a mighty Divine purpose rolling through the ages; it will unseal the fountains of joy, and give health to the whole being. On this personal communion with the Spirit all Public Worship is founded. Its object is to give collective expression to these individual experiences; and so, by sharing, quicken and enrich the life of all. There is no fixed rule, that I am aware of, for the formal ordering of Public Worship, and that will be best which best meets the needs of the special congregation. One general principle only we suggest. Public Worship is a language, and like all language exists to convey ideas. Let each case be measured by this standard—does it express in an adequate manner the awful grandeur and beauty of the Spirit? and does the message reach the worshipper? Adapt everything to that end, remembering that the purpose of all worship is to uplift, refresh, and inspire. One part, I think, the Pastor will pay special attention to—the music. It ought not to be treated lightly, as an amusement, or means of filling up a gap. It is the natural language of the Spirit, and may carry to the worshipper a message of hope, or trust, or aspiration; of penitence, or joy, or solemnity, in a manner for which the articulate words of the sermon may be quite unsuited. If some poet-musician could be found amongst us who would write a collection of Church Services celebrating the real mystery—the mystery of common life—with its wonder and joy and endless pathos, he would earn our sincere gratitude.

The Pastor's Manifold Opportunities.

There are many other departments of Pastoral work which time forbids to do more than mention. The exhibition of lofty ideals ought to produce dissatisfaction with the actual, and in some cases an evil past may be an intolerable burden. It will be the Pastor's duty to show that nothing really belongs to a person except what he loves; or, to explain, as is done in Mr. Wicksteed's little book—"A Religion for Time and Eternity," that the past is part of a work not yet finished, so that its essential character may be altered by it being transmuted into nobler life and action. In any case he will bid the oppressed go free. Then he will be a friend among his people, meeting them individually, and sharing in their troubles. Probably many sacred confidences will be reposed in him; he will come into close touch with those in distress through sickness, or in the near prospect of death; and the necessity of giving counsel, or imparting the serenity of submission to the divine will, may task his energies to the utmost. It will, however, be his grandest opportunity, and the knowledge of having done good, or having won the gratitude of those who most require his help, will be his best reward: for it will give him fresh inspiration for his work.

All through the whole course of his ministry, though there may be diversities of operations, one great purpose will animate him—to be a medium for the Spirit—a channel through which the Divine Will may be done, and the world blessed. And in that part of his work of which we are now treating—which is primary—he will not seek to accomplish his end by mere debate, but by the exhibition of grand ideals, illustrated in natural objects, in living men and women, and in himself. For in this universe of souls there is a great law of spiritual induction. As a common piece of steel becomes a magnet by being brought within the magnetic field of another magnet, so one human being may infect another with "the unmeasured thirst for good." To see the beauty of the Divine Life is to become transformed to it. And this divine loveliness is everywhere, using all being that will consent to it, as its medium; and making everything through which it passes beautiful like itself. How many souls have been made attractive through the vision of a beauty in others that seemed to make itself over to them! The well-known words—"We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is," express a great spiritual principle, not confined in its action to one person in the history of the world, but operating in every one of us to-day; and to work in accordance with this law, and through it help to lift the world into the higher levels of its true life, is the special work of the Pastor.

The Pastor expounding the Doctrine of Life.

Up to this point we have spoken of the work of the Pastor in its practical aspect, having for its object the formation of the highest type of human character. Let us assume now that he has partially succeeded. His congregation have seen at least a glimpse of the heavenly vision, and desire to realise it in the actual world. Along with this impulse to make the ideal real, there will arise another desire, just as proper and natural—the longing to know something of what this life of the Spirit is, and to express such thoughts in an intelligible form. Without the experience we have been speaking of, such thinking, in any real sense, is impossible; with that experience it becomes unavoidable. What is this life—this spirit—that commands us?—they ask. In what relation does it stand to our individual selves, and to the objects around us? How did it first gain entrance to the human consciousness? What is its connection with human history?—especially with the person and life of Jesus of Nazareth? What bearing has this Spirit of Life on our own individual future? These, and a thousand other questions of a like nature, constitute what is known as Theology; and through a living experience they become of vital consequence, and will not be turned aside. Now the Pastor, we assume, has been trained in the study of these questions, and has a message of his own to deliver. He will speak of the great themes of Duty and God, and Immortality; and he will set forth his convictions with all the charity, but also with all the clearness and energy that is possible to him. At this point, however, a most important distinction has to be made. When the Pastor speaks as the representative of the Spirit—of righteousness and holiness and love—he speaks with authority, and he who rejects his message passes judgment on himself. When he gives utterance to his own views or opinions he simply speaks for himself—as an individual to individuals—and anyone is entitled to qualify, criticise, or differ from him. It is this great principle of intellectual freedom which differentiates the group of churches which we represent from some of the older religious organisations. Many, if not most, of these older Churches make no distinction between the possession and the understanding of the Spirit; and so, with them, doctrinal divergence from a certain standard is a sin, and concurrence a necessary condition to the Divine favour. With us it is quite otherwise. We recognise the right, if not the duty, of every person to form his own convictions, and therefore regard honest variety of thought not as a crime, but as a virtue—a sign of life, and not of death.

Encourage Independence of Thought.

Amongst us, therefore, the Pastor has a special duty here. He will encourage independent thought. He will, if possible, form classes for the study of Theology, and do all in his power to draw out his people into expression of their genuine convictions. What! it may be said, men of business occupied with the market, clerks and tradesmen, are they fit for such studies? Yes; whoever is a fit subject for religious experience—which means, whoever has duty to do, or trials to encounter—is also the right person to interpret that experience. Not only so, but it is, we think, just those people who are harassed with cares, or whose lives are dull and prosaic, that most need the illumination of "thoughts that wander through eternity." And there can be no doubt whatever that such principles when consistently carried out must lead to a wide diversity of belief. But the wise Pastor will not be dismayed thereby; he will even rejoice, being probably of the same mind as the famous American who declared—"I would as soon preach to a basket of eggs as to a congregation where all think alike." It is life he wants, and life means variety; and nothing, it seems to us, can be more attractive, nothing more hopeful and exhilarating than a company of men and women animated by a living interest in Divine things, who, while differing from each other, in their very differences stimulate and assist each other, because all actuated by one lofty purpose. The result to the Pastor will be that he will live in an atmosphere of intellectual activity that is simply glorious. He will be interested in Biblical Criticism, and in the study of Comparative Religion, in Science and Literature, and all that makes for truth and human progress; and he will speak out when occasion requires in clear, unmistakable terms, even though his words bring down anathemas upon his devoted head. Nor let it be supposed that there will be no intellectual agreement under such a pastorate. There will not be uniformity, but there may be a marvellous unity, each coming to his own conclusion in his own way; and yet all agreeing together in the only way that makes agreement worth having—a natural and living concurrence. Neither let anyone be afraid of the result: for out of all this ferment of thought there will come in due time—there is coming even now—a splendid Theology and Philosophy of life: the natural expression of our spiritual condition, and fully adequate to satisfy all the best aspirations of mankind. And this dawning revelation will not be the monopoly of one individual, or of one system alone. For truth is a Divine word into which the thought of every man is designed to read, each single person deciphering with special clearness that aspect of it which his genius best enables him to perceive. And as with individuals, so with systems. The Pastor may come to see in other great world creeds not falsehoods, but rather partial truths, held, it may be, in a narrow spirit, and which he, from his central standpoint, may better understand than their special champions; and this larger view will give to him both joy and power. The sacredness of the individual, that is the abiding truth underlying the principle of intellectual freedom. Each is necessary to the whole, and each must be a unique and original revelation of the same Divine Spirit. It is an inspiring thought.

Sir Oliver Lodge tells us that spirit unites while body isolates; and it is but a variation of the same thought to say that love combines while thought individualises. Both are indispensable. The culture of the spirit fills the intellect with living power. The culture of the intellect gives to the spirit that form which is necessary for its perfect expression. For the universe is a universe of individuals, distinguished from each other, as well as united together; and in order to be truly representative of the Infinite, we must be not only unconscious channels of spiritual influence, but also self-conscious centres in which the spirit is reflected. And the work of the Pastor can only be imperfectly accomplished until he assists in the development of all the powers of the human soul.

Inward Education: Outward Reformation.

In the introduction to this paper we stated our belief that the work of the Pastor is that of a teacher, whose duty it is to draw forth the best that is in man. And now, let us ask, what does this educative process—this cleansing of the springs of action—tend towards as a final result? It is, we know, an inward education which the Pastor aims to impart, but, as we are also aware, all outward excellence comes from within; and consequently, he who is leading his fellows into responsiveness to higher motives is really creating a new world politically and socially. But his work has also a more immediate and personal aspect. He is dealing with man as a moral and spiritual being; and in the mere statement that man is such a being, capable of indefinite progress, there are involved stupendous possibilities. For, looked at attentively, what is this inward strengthening and purification of motive but the evolution of higher faculty? And an unfoldment of faculty implies not only an alteration in our subjective state, but also an increased means of access to the objective reality by which we are surrounded. We all know how attractive Nature may appear to us in special moods, when possibly, the inward sight has been purged by some cleansing experience.

"Out of our sadness have we made the world so beautiful."

That glorious description of a sunrise at the opening of Browning's poem "Pippa Passes," is a true picture; but also a picture that can only be seen by simple-hearted goodness. And is not the well-known beatitude, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," but a comprehensive statement of the same great law?

Renewed in Nobler Life.

In the light of this truth we can see in what a grand work he is engaged who seeks to purify the springs of action in human souls. He is bringing heaven to earth. When self-seeking is rooted out of the heart, then man becomes responsive to the divinest truths, and for the first time real joy becomes possible to him. In such a life a force is set to work in the world that may transfigure it. Contact with such a personality caused one great soul to rejoice "with joy unspeakable and full of glory"; and another to record his experience in these words—"as having nothing, and yet possessing all things." At such a stage as this men hardly care to stop to argue about the problem of evil. Its purpose is too evident. Pain is seen to be love's possibility. Struggle, difficulty, separation, and death itself, are regarded as parts of an educational process, whereby is wrought into us the necessary power of apperception that makes it possible to rise into communion with the Divine Perfection. Such a dawning spiritual consciousness has been grandly pictured by Tennyson in the "Ancient Sage."

> "My son, the world is dark with griefs and graves,
> So dark that men cry out against the heavens.
> Who knows but that the darkness is in man?
> For wert thou born or blind or deaf, and then > Suddenly healed, how wouldst thou glory in all
> The splendours and the voices of the world!
> And we, the poor earth's dying race, and yet
> No phantoms watching from a phantom shore,
> Await the last and largest sense to make
> The phantom walls of this illusion fade,
> And show us that the world is wholly fair."

And so, at last, men may come to live in the knowledge that revelation is everywhere—in the common and the near, as well as in the distant and unfamiliar. They may discover that everything is co-operating for the evolution of the individual, and for the grouping of these individuals into such sacred fellowships that they together form a kind of soul-music through which the Divine Artist communicates Himself.

It is a lofty ideal; but only lofty ideals can inspire great efforts. Every Pastor needs such a vision to give him courage, and constancy, and joy in the work he has undertaken. Having caught a glimpse of the Divine Purpose, he must, like Browning's great musician, be "patient and proud"; proud in the consciousness of the heavenly vision, and patient in the application of it to the sins and sorrows of human life.

The Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., was the first speaker in the discussion on the papers. He pointed to the different apprehension of the subject in the two papers, yet both had laid emphasis on the true minister's love of souls, the care of a man for the soul and heart of his brother man or of the little child growing up under the Church's nurture or within its fellowship. It was not given to them to speak of souls and soul-experience quite as readily as to members of some of the other Churches, but as they grew in years and experience such speaking of the things of the soul could not be confined to the pulpit. Out of the first simple superficial acts of intercourse in pastoral visiting might grow as time passed that deep trust and affection on one side and the other, which enabled the people to look to their minister as a true friend in the hour of need and darkness, and made the minister feel that he could to some extent meet the wants of struggling and afflicted souls. Opportunities of that sort, though they could not be forced, might always be found by the earnest worker. Mr. Drummond had quoted Richard Baxter. He would add a quotation of a different kind from the "Saints' Everlasting Rest," a great book, in parts repulsive to them, but in others most beautiful and helpful. Baxter, there addressing an idle and neglectful minister, asks, "What wilt thou say when thou seest thy whole parish come bellowing after thee into hell?" That did not exactly appeal to them; they could not quite take that view of the minister's responsibility. But whoever took his work seriously must feel called according to his ability to be the true helper of his people. If not responsible for their souls in the way Baxter considered, he must surely try by every means in his power to strengthen in the hearts of young and old alike, of rich and poor, of saint and sinner, of the crabbed and the kindly, the true springs of life, and help them to rise to the higher possibilities of their being. Though they might state their duty somewhat differently, the duty was there and every true man would respond to it, and desire to put his whole strength of service into it. For that purpose they entered the ministry. Having the Divine vision they desired to help others to realise it. In conclusion, he quoted some helpful words of the late T. W. Freckelton in a charge to a young minister:—

> When your heart is sad and weary and you are discouraged and doubtful, turn to the little children, the lambs of the flock, and for God, the Great Shepherd, be you their under-shepherd and lead and feed them and carry them in your bosom. They are the to-morrow of the world, the prophecy of humanity. You shall always read hope in their eyes and find the innocent Kingdom of God in their young souls; and to touch them will be to take to yourself fresh courage and strength and cheer.

Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, of Manchester, also spoke, and said that the minister who was most perfect in his own character, who manifested the greatest personal sympathy in all relations with his congregation was the one who would ultimately solve the difficulty of the success of any Christian Church. Their great ideal of pastoral work must be that of Christ himself, pictured in the words of Jesus as the Good Shepherd: "When the shepherd hath put forth of his own, he goeth before them and the sheep follow him, for they know his voice. . . . The Good Shepherd layeth down his life for the sheep." That "laying down of life" could be manifested throughout the whole of the pastor's life and work. In conclusion, he quoted the following passage from Dr. Martineau's letter to the Conference of 1882, reprinted in last week's Inquirer:—

> No Christian Society can subsist upon its own internal relations alone, and, like a monastery, shut out the confusion and the cries of the world around. We acknowledge, with all Christendom, that the Missionary spirit is inseparable from the religious life; and that it is impossible for a people to train themselves in the school of Christ, yet remain quiet neighbours to the victims of passion, ignorance, and wrong. Where there is no sorrow felt for those to whom God is dead, and the heavens are dark, no pity for those whose life is a flight from pursuing Fate into the grim arms of "the last enemy," no longing to seek and to save the lost, how can there be either love of God or "enthusiasm of humanity"? No Christian Society gives any adequate expression of its essential character, unless from its heart goes forth some message of healing and entreaty to its neighbourhood; and it is but a selfish membership that looks coldly on such evangelising work.

Time not allowing of further discussion, the Chairman, in conclusion, remarked on the difficulties arising from the lack of a clear understanding of what was meant by a "pastor." And he added: "I should like my last word to you to be a solemn warning that until you have faced that problem, faced it forgetting the power of mere material things where the needs of the human soul are concerned, there is no chance of establishing among you a spiritual power that will give meaning to those words, often eloquent, but short of actual realisation, those words in which we make the brotherhood of man to be the supreme expression of that which should guide us in our efforts to establish not only the pastoral ideal but the spiritual ideal in our midst."

THE EDUCATION QUESTION.

Mr. Richard D. Holt then moved the following resolution on the Education Question :—

This Conference records its profound regret that the Education Act of 1902, while providing for the complete maintenance of all public elementary schools out of public funds, perpetuates the old vicious and discredited system of religious tests for employment by the State, by confining the head-teacherships in 17,000 departments to persons professing a particular theological creed ; and the Conference urges all its members to labour earnestly that the just principles of freedom from religious tests which has worked so admirably in the higher seats of learning should be applied in all publicly-aided schools and colleges.

This Conference further protests against the provisions of the Act by which local authorities are compelled to vote large sums of money out of the rates to schools over which they have not full and entire control.

He did not know, he said, whether any apology was needed for introducing to a meeting essentially of a religious character a resolution of a political character, but no body of religious men could be indifferent to the subject dealt with in that resolution, or to politics which was essentially the concerted action of the citizens. It was not possible for a meeting of that body, churches which had always boasted of their attachment to the cause of civil and religious liberty, to pass over the Education Act of last year without an emphatic resolution of protest. He should refer to the two chief objections stated. The first was that the Act imposed a religious test on the teachers. They objected to religious tests of every kind and had carried that objection in regard to all civil servants, with the two exceptions of the Lord Chancellor and the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, but now they were to be imposed on half the elementary teachers of the country. The test on the teachers was a gross injustice to the pupils, because it prevented them from getting the best possible teachers, and it was a great injustice to the teachers, because it prevented deserving persons from getting positions to which they were entitled on their merits. That was a great discouragement to good men to take up the profession. The religious test did not really succeed in confining the posts to those who held the opinions in question, but to those who would profess them. The worst people could get them by making the necessary profession. He might remind them that in the time of the great rebellion the cause of the army with Cromwell only prevailed when he began to choose his officers on account of their military skill and not on account of their religious opinions. The second main objection was against payment without control. It was a fixed corner-stone of the liberties of the people that the man who finds the money should control the expenditure of it. They looked forward to the time when there would be universal School Boards, and it was lamentable to see how ruthlessly the great Boards had been destroyed, and that element had been blotted out of the educational system of the country. Under this Act voluntary bodies still made some small contribution for the use of their buildings. They ought to refuse all subscriptions from private persons and take away every pretext, however shadowy, for keeping out public management and control. The resolution called upon them to labour earnestly to remove these two blots on the educational system of the country.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie seconded the resolution as one deeply interested in education, who hoped that the time would soon come when the whole question would be taken out of the miserable narrowness which now characterised its treatment, and it would be dealt with by the whole people of England, as citizens interested in the highest welfare of their country. Unitarians had steadfastly refused to allow the question to be brought within the range of sectarianism. The reason why they had that miserably inadequate Act was that the Government, instead of thinking of the needs of the children and the national welfare, had listened to the sectarian and special class interests. But he was in favour of using the Act to the uttermost, till they could get something better. One of the most hopeful signs was that already they saw that the Borough and County Councils were not going to allow ecclesiasticism to have its way. The clerical party in the House and outside had missed their mark, and the thin end of the wedge of popular control had made its entrance. That wedge would be driven in further and further until the whole control of the education of the country was in the hands of the citizens. There had been a temporary victory apparently, but it would be short-lived—short-lived, at any rate, if those who cared for those things would follow the advice of the resolution and labour earnestly for them. As to the tests for teachers, what he felt most of all was the injustice done to the children of the nation. It was a manifest and gross injustice that they should be robbed of the opportunity to have for their teachers the wisest and best that England could give them. That was why the present system was calculated to do such mischief. The training colleges for teachers were for the most part in the hands of the denominationalists, and only a few were open without tests. Every year at the scholarship examinations a large proportion of those who pass high up in the first division are barred from the privilege of being trained as teachers in the colleges because they cannot make the necessary profession of faith. They must make persistent war against those theological seminaries for the training of teachers, and make an end of the gross injustice. They looked for a time when justice and freedom should prevail throughout the Empire ; but civil and religious liberty in the broadest sense would only prevail if they looked after the boys and girls and trained them in the highest and best. Then as the years passed they would reach nearer and nearer to the realisation of those dreams of a higher and better world for the men and women of England.

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, as an old member of the National Education League, made a vigorous fighting speech in support of the resolution. He honoured those who were about to refuse to pay the rate, but he did not agree with them. They should try rather to work the Act against the animus of its authors. They did not live under a tyranny but in a constitutional country. The laity of England had no sympathy with ecclesiastical control.

Mr. Arnold Lupton objected to all compulsion in education, in the matter of the three R's no less than of denominational teaching.

Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, as a member of the London County Council, declared the London Bill hopelessly impracticable, and the resolution was then passed with only three or four dissentients in the large meeting.

THE CONVERSAZIONE.

In the evening a very successful conversazione was held in the Walker Art Gallery, the guests being received by Mr. Charles W. Jones, J.P. (local president), and the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A. (President of the National Conference). The crowd of friends from all parts of the country passing through the suite of rooms, which contains the splendid permanent collection of pictures belonging to the City of Liverpool, had a rare opportunity for delightful meetings. Among the guests were Professor Jean Réville and Madame Réville, Professor Toy, and the Rev. John Watson, D.D. (Ian Maclaren), and Dr. John Hunter.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

For the first time in the history of the Conference, it devolves on the Committee to present a report of its proceedings since the last Triennial Meeting. The past three years have been marked by much faithful unassuming labour. Tried friends, long joined with us in common fellowship of work and prayer, have obeyed the call to enter the higher life. These incidents do not enter into our record, though they are not unremembered in our hearts. But two topics may be briefly noticed before we proceed to report the details of the fulfilment of the charge laid upon us by the Assembly of 1900.

The Ministers' Pensions Fund has been created in accordance with the scheme then adopted, and is now in successful operation. Contributions to it were received from all parts of the United Kingdom, and your Committee believe not only that it will prove in the future a valuable financial aid to our ministers in making provision for their advancing years, but that this common effort has already drawn ministers and people more closely together by evincing the sincere respect and affectionate goodwill of the worshippers in our churches towards the men who are charged with the high duty of maintaining the efficiency of their public services.

At Whitsuntide in 1901 a remarkable gathering took place in Essex Hall, London, at which a large number of our ministers and laity were present, convened under the auspices of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. Fifteen nationalities and eighteen different religious communities were represented ; and a tone of joyous sympathy and earnest hope filled the proceedings day by day. Such meetings must needs be rare ; but their helpful quickening cannot be too highly estimated.

Turning now to details, it will be in the recollection of the members of the Conference that, in pursuance of a recommendation of the Committee at Leicester on April 5, 1900, a set of rules (which had been prepared with great care) was adopted by the Conference ; and that twelve members of Committee, together with the President and other officers, were elected accordingly. Additional members were subsequently nominated under Rule 7 by the District Associations, and the number of the Committee was finally completed by the co-optation, according to Rule 6 (c) of three additional members,—namely, Rev. J. E. Odgers and Messrs. David Martineau and A. H. Worthington. On Oct. 3, 1901, the Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., wrote to resign his membership of the Committee, to which he had been elected by the Conference at Leicester. The resignation was accepted on Oct. 15, 1901, and the President wrote a sympathetic reply. The Committee did not feel it needful to fill up the vacancy; but it is confident that the Conference will share in the deep regret which all feel at the serious and prolonged illness of Dr. Herford.

The Committee has held twelve ordinary quarterly meetings since the last Conference, assembling in London, Oxford, Manchester, or Birmingham, according to convenience. It also held a special meeting on Feb. 13 1901, when a loyal and dutiful address to King Edward VII. was prepared, expressing heart-felt sympathy on the death of Queen Victoria, and the loyal assurance of its earnest prayer for his own prosperous reign. An answer from the Home Office to this address was read at the Committee meeting on April 17, 1901.

Very interesting letters from Mr. Basil Martineau and from his sister, acknowledging the resolutions passed at the Leicester Conference on the death of Dr. Martineau, were received, read to the Committee on May 3, 1900, and ordered to be entered on the minutes.

The death of Mr. Frank Taylor, a member of the Committee of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund, is also recorded with regret upon the minutes of the Committee.

Very early in its proceedings the Committee found it necessary to take into consideration the important subjects of finance and the organisation of its own work. During the first years of its existence the Conference was involved in little more expenditure than the printing and other charges for the preparation of its triennial meetings. These costs were met in a private manner by the generosity of a few friends to whom the treasurer applied as occasion arose. Nor was the work so heavy but that it could be adequately discharged by the honorary officers. But by a very natural process the operations of the Conference have during twenty-one years grown in importance and extent, so that the work is much more onerous than at first, and the Committee feel that the time has arrived when the Conference must consider the appointment of a paid secretary. The Standing Committee now meets quarterly, and is further compelled to appoint sub-committees to deal with the various subjects referred to it by the triennial meeting. Consequently a considerable correspondence is involved, and a large and regular expenditure entailed for the travelling expenses of the Committee, as well as for printing, &c. Further, it is felt extremely desirable that the Conference should occasionally visit the less wealthy districts of the country, and in such cases it must be prepared to guarantee a portion of the expenses incurred. The whole position was considered with great care, especially the case for the appointment of a paid secretary, and the President and Mr. Wood were requested to draw up a report upon the functions of the proposed office. That report pointed out that whatever the expenses of the Conference, they should be borne more generally by the churches than is now the case. As to the work of the Committee and its adequate discharge, together with the need for a permanent official and the duties of his office, the following extracts from a circular subsequently drawn up by the Committee, the issue of which was deferred, will perhaps assist the Conference in coming to a decision:—

"The work delegated to the Committee by the Conference at its successive triennial meetings becomes more and more varied, extensive, and responsible, calling for more time and attention than it is reasonable to suppose honorary secretaries can give. At the last Conference meeting three most important questions were referred to the Committee, or to special committees then appointed, —namely (a) the Superannuation Fund, (b) the Promotion and Federation of Guilds, and (c) the Supply of Students for the Ministry. These subjects have necessitated numerous and prolonged meetings, many journeys, and a vast amount of correspondence involving many weeks of merely clerical labour on the part of the President and others.*

"It will, therefore, be seen that very practical reasons have urged the Committee to the conclusion that if the whole business of the Conference as it now stands is to be efficiently discharged there must be an official whose duty it shall be to take up, prepare, and co-ordinate the work of the various committees, arrange the business details of the Conference, and undertake the clerical work required. Indeed, the Committee feels that unless a secretary is appointed who can give himself to the work of the Conference, the usefulness of the Conference will be unfortunately limited, and the consideration of many pressing questions will have to be abandoned.

"But further, looking forward to the matters that must engage the attention of the Conference during the next few years—such urgent and important questions as ministerial stipends, the strengthening of our weaker churches, how to secure the co-operation of all for the good of each, and above all the quickening of new life and the promotion of a closer unity in our churches —the Committee feels that the services of a trusted and capable ministerial secretary, who shall give his whole time to the duties of the office, will be absolutely essential.

"An important part of the duties of such an office would lie in his function as pastor-at-large. There is an ample field for a minister of tact, experience, and energy who shall bring encouragement to the struggling churches and be himself a personal link between the several groups united in the National Conference.

"There are many signs that the principles of thought and life for which our churches stand are spreading; but their organised expression makes no corresponding advance. In the meantime, changes in the population, the vicissitudes of families once holding honoured places in our congregations, and other circumstances, are seriously affecting many of our scattered homes of faith and worship. It would undoubtedly be a help and encouragement to them to receive the services of a pastor-at-large who should represent the National Conference, and thus convey to them the support of membership in a common body, and quicken their devotion to a common cause."

After long and careful deliberation, the Committee passed the following resolution:—"That the Committee approves of the general policy of the report with respect to finance and the appointment of a paid secretary, and recommends it to the Conference."

It may be added that if a minister of sufficient experience and standing could be appointed to the office, his counsels would be widely sought in the crises of Church life. Not only the smaller but also the larger churches would welcome his visits, and he could do much to bring the strength of the strong to the help of the weak.

The Committee therefore trusts that the Conference will itself make an appeal to the churches for an adequate and permanent income, and that, if the necessary funds can be raised, it will sanction the appointment of a ministerial secretary, who shall also act as pastor-at-large.

The first duty of the Committee, after its appointment, was to take steps with regard to two matters referred to by the Conference for its consideration and action, viz., as to the suggestions made by the Rev. John Ellis in his paper entitled "How best to organise the Religious Life of our Young People," and as to the resolution "that the Committee of the Conference be instructed to take into consideration the formation of a Board for assisting in providing for the future ministry."

At the first meeting of the Committee a small sub-committee —the President, Rev. J. C. Street, Rev. J. Ellis, and Mr. H. P. Greg—was appointed to prepare a circular calling the attention of our churches and schools to Mr. Ellis's paper, urging their earnest consideration of it with a view to the religious education of our young people, adding that the matter is receiving the attention of the Conference Committee, and inviting suggestions and information. This circular, together with a copy of Mr. Ellis's paper, was issued to all ministers and Sunday-school superintendents in June, 1900. In the following October Mr. Ellis reported encouraging results, and the Revs. J. Ellis, C. Hargrove, J. Wood, W. H. Drummond, H. Gow, W. G. Tarrant, Messrs. H. P. Greg, Ion Pritchard, and Miss Florence Hill, with power to add to their number, were appointed to carry out his suggestions, viz.: (1) To draft a scheme of union of existing societies, classes, and similar bodies; (2) to advocate the formation of new ones; and (3) to compile a manual which will tend to uniformity of operations. For these purposes a sum of £20 was placed at its disposal. Mr. Wood was chosen as chairman. A constitution was drawn up and approved by the Committee, and the Guilds' Union thus established was formally inaugurated at a successful meeting held at Little Portland-street Chapel, London, on May 30, 1901. It was joined by twenty-three guilds, having a membership of 1,297; twelve unaffiliated guilds had an additional membership of 560, and a number of new guilds have since been formed and have joined the Union. The first annual meeting was held at Birmingham on Easter Tuesday, 1902, the proceedings of which were duly reported at the time in The Inquirer and Christian Life. A special report will be presented by the Guilds' Union.

Another sub-committee, consisting of the President, the Rev. J. E. Odgers, Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Rev. W. H. Drummond, Rev. Joseph Wood, Rev. Dendy Agate, Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, Mr. James R. Beard, Mr. John Dendy, with Mr. A. H. Worthington as secretary, was appointed to consider the paper read at Leicester by Mr. Worthington on "The Future Supply of Ministers." This Committee made recommendations in favour of the constitution of a Board and as to its membership and objects. These recommendations were printed and circulated among the members of the General Committee. They were approved in outline, and referred back to the sub-committee on certain points, but hitherto nothing further has been done.

A resolution having been carried at Leicester expressing the desire of the Conference to establish a memorial to Dr. Martineau if a suitable scheme could be devised, a sub-committee was appointed to consider the question. Manchester College was already in possession of its beautiful statue, to which contributions had been sent from all parts of the country; and no further commemoration seemed needed in the place where Dr. Martineau's chief work had been done. The sub-committee, after making inquiries concerning various plans, decided to take no further steps.

* Several other important subjects have been dealt with by the Committee in addition to those delegated to it by the Conference.

The desire for greater unity in the devotional services of our churches has often found expression, and suggestions have from time to time been made in favour of some common order of worship, or at least some generally recognised collection of hymns. Accordingly, at the meeting of the Committee in January, 1901, the Rev. Joseph Wood proposed that to meet this want, and to bring up the standard of our devotional literature to the high level of poetic utterance reached at the close of the last century, a Conference hymn-book should be published as a help to the spiritual life of our churches in the new century. The matter was considered by the Committee at its following meeting, when a sub-committee, consisting of the Revs. W. H. Drummond, F. K. Freeston, H. Gow, W. G. Tarrant, Joseph Wood, and Messrs. George Leigh and Sydney Jones, with the addition of Revs. A. Bennett, J. M. Connell, Valentine Davis, and E. I. Fripp, was appointed to inquire and report as to the advisability and cost of producing a Conference hymn-book in two editions—one with music and one without—the cost to include copyrights and music, and, as far as possible, all expenses; and also to consider and report on the principles of selection and arrangement proposed for adoption. This sub-committee presented an elaborate printed report at a subsequent meeting of the Committee on Oct. 15, 1901, but no recommendation was made. The subject was felt to be very important, and was discussed with great interest and thoroughness; and the chairman of the sub-committee gave notice that he would submit a resolution approving of the preparation and adoption of a Conference hymn-book at the next triennial meeting of the Conference.

At the Sheffield Conference in 1897 a Committee was appointed in consequence of a paper read by Mr. Cogan Conway on the question of the superannuation of ministers. It presented a report to the Leicester Conference in 1900, which was duly approved, and a Committee was appointed "to carry out the scheme now adopted for a Ministers' Superannuation Fund with such modifications as may be found advisable, and to take steps to raise the necessary funds." That Committee, having received its appointment immediately from the Conference, will, no doubt, make its report direct to the Conference itself; but it has, from time to time, courteously communicated to your Committee the steps it has taken in carrying out its instructions.

The following resolution was passed at a meeting of the Conference Committee on March 11, 1902:—"That in the opinion of this Committee the constitution for carrying out the superannuation scheme of the National Conference should be submitted by the special Committee entrusted with the carrying out of that scheme to the National Conference for approval or otherwise."

Various other matters have come under the consideration of the Committee during its three years of office, viz.:—

The Protestantenbond having announced to the Committee that its annual meeting would be held at Utrecht on Oct. 29 and 30, 1901, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who had been already appointed as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, undertook the additional duty of representing the Conference. The same Bond repeated its invitation to their meeting on Oct. 28, 1902, and the President was requested to acknowledge the invitation with gratitude.

On May 20, 1902, a very full and emphatic protest against the Government Education Bill was unanimously adopted by the Committee, and copies of it were sent to the Marquis of Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, and various newspapers. Its concluding paragraph was as follows:—"That the Bill, instead of freeing secular education from sectarian interests, perpetuates and embitters religious strife (a) by offering a premium to the creation of small Denominational schools to be set up in rivalry to the people's schools, (b) by importing the religious question into municipal elections, (c) by refusing to free the training colleges for teachers from religious tests, (d) by practically excluding free access to the teaching profession in schools under denominational control, (e) by narrowing the scope of the Cowper-Temple clause, (f) by relieving the subscribers to Denominational schools of the cost of denominational teaching."

The latest, though not the least important duty of the Committee was to arrange for the Conference of 1903. There is always a little anxiety felt by the Committee as to the place of meeting of each Conference, and it was with considerable satisfaction that the Committee accepted an invitation from Liverpool to celebrate the twenty-first anniversary of the establishment of the Conference in the city which gave it birth in the year 1882. Careful and anxious consideration has been given to the preparation of the programme, which it trusts will be found to bring forward many interesting and useful topics for consideration. Finally, it was its duty, according to Rule 12, to suggest persons whom it deemed qualified, and whom it has ascertained to be willing to serve as officers. This it has accordingly done, and the names will be submitted in due course for the consideration of the Conference.

In now resigning its trust to their successors, the Committee congratulates the Conference on attaining its majority in the city of its birth. Much has been done, but more remains to do. Vast masses of our people are still untouched by the great ideas of religion. We believe that in the truths and principles which it is the aim of our churches to cherish as the foundations of faith and life, lie the strength and the hope of the future. May we realise the greatness of our opportunity, and go forth with fresh confidence to bring new souls into the service of the Living God.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

On the eve of the meeting of the National Conference in Liverpool (Monday, April 20), the Guilds' Union held its annual meeting at Ullet-road Church. The Council met at five o'clock, after which a reception was held in the Church Hall, and members and friends were entertained to tea by the President, the Rev. Joseph Wood.

A large congregation assembled in the beautiful church at a quarter-past seven for a religious service, which was conducted by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Kidderminster. The surpliced choir of the church took part in the service, which included the anthem, "Seek ye the Lord." The Rev. J. J. Wright, of Chowbent, gave a very earnest address, from the words of Matt. x. 8, "Freely ye have received, freely give." Those, he said, were Christ's words, speaking to his Apostles. To give freely was the beautiful and beneficent law of all good life. They could not even begin the better life without in some way obeying that law. "To give is to live, to deny is to die." They also were Christ's apostles, not only disciples, with much to learn, but apostles with something to do and to be, for which they were sent, and which if they neglected, Christ's work, God's kingdom on earth would suffer.

He then asked them to consider what their churches had done for the young and what the young people could do for their churches. He urged them to be proud of the inheritance of their churches, with their great principles of freedom and sincerity in religion, and remember that they could give loyal service and the idealism and energies of their young life. Everyone who belonged to a church was in office and had much to give.

At the conclusion of the service the annual meeting was held in the Church Hall, which was well filled, and the meeting was of the heartiest character and full of encouragement for the work of the Guilds. The President took the chair, and the report of the council was read by the secretary, the Rev. John Ellis:—

The report stated that the Council had held four meetings during the year, and urged the formation of local unions of Guilds, such as that recently formed in London. The prize essay scheme proposed last year by the President had been carried out with some success. Sixteen essays had been sent in on "Richard Baxter," fourteen on "The Story of St. Paul," and two on "Hymns and Hymn Makers of the Nineteenth Century." Members of ten Guilds took part in the competition. Substantial progress had been made during the year, and there are now thirty-four Guilds in the Union, with 1,934 members, while twenty kindred societies with 538 members also sent in returns. By nearly half of the Guilds the "Manual of Services and Prayers for use at Guild Meetings" has been adopted. The report also noted various kinds of helpful service undertaken by members of the Guilds, and concluded:—"It is this call to the culture of the better life, and again to spend their gathered treasures for the good of others, that will ultimately win our young people to loyal attachment to the Church, and through the Church to faithful service for the welfare of their fellow-men. In this belief the Council again commends the Guild movement to the Churches, and asks each Guild member to be true to his motto and stand for 'God and the Good Life.'"

Mr. H. P. Greg having made his statement as treasurer, the Chairman moved the adoption of the report and accounts, at the same time announcing the award of the prizes for essays which had been invited from Guild members on Richard Baxter, the Life of St. Paul, and Hymns and Hymn Makers of the Nineteenth Century.

Mr. Richard Robinson seconded the resolution, and strongly urged that the chief aim of guild members should be to render practical services to the people of their neighbourhood, and so let the influence of the better life, nurtured in the church, permeate the life of those around.

The Rev. E. W. Lummis proposed the election of officers, the Rev. Joseph Wood, at the strong urgency of his fellow-members, consenting to be re-elected President. Mr. Lummis quoted the plea of the late Rev. John Byles, at the Leicester discussion on Guilds, that the young people should be organised not for religious introspection, but for service, and showed how the strength of their chief guilds was actually in the varied services they undertook.

The motion was seconded by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, and, being passed, a vote of thanks to the Chairman and the Ullet-road congregation, moved by the Rev. C. Hargrove, and seconded by the Rev. H. Fisher Short, brought the meeting to a close.

THE DRIFTING WORLD.

Born in this country and in America, grave and perplexed discussions continue on the now burning question:—Why is the world drifting away from the Church? The question is not usually put in that way, but that is how it presents itself to me.

For my own part, I think that, as a rule, institutions and persons get about what they deserve, or what the age deserves through them, whether it be a deserted church or a crucified Christ; and the deserting and the crucifixion do not necessarily mean the sufferer's defect and fault. There are times of transition, times of sullen revolt, times of puzzled onlooking or rising scorn, and all these bring their results of crumbling or their consuming fires.

These are days of special energy, audacity, invention, and eagerness for pleasure and amusement. How then can we expect the surging crowds to sit and stand, to believe and bow, to deny themselves and to be harnessed in the old way? The other day, at the recognition of a young minister, I took for my subject, "Can organised Christianity and the Church survive the bicycle?" That question might be put in a dozen ways, with some other word or phrase for "bicycle," but it would come to the same thing.

Now, this drifting away of the world from the Church does not mean vice; it does not even necessarily mean a lowered religious vitality—taking the word "religion" in a wide sense; but it does mean narrowing and dwarfing, and it may easily come to mean materialism and mere self-regarding, self-worship, and love of pleasure; and to that extent it is an evil sign of the times.

What can be done? I am afraid it is impossible to tell the plain truth and yet be on pleasant terms with churches and their tenants. The poor patient is worse even than he seems to be. If we deduct the crowds that go to church only as for a social function or for a pretty musical service, or that go to chapel for sensation and company, what have we left? We hardly dare think it out.

Speaking broadly, I would say that we think too much of churches and chapels, as though they were the only test, and as though they were our only chance, and I am positive that we spend money very foolishly, and even injuriously, on churches. Our costly spires and pillars and arches and ecclesiastical imitations and patches are all wrong. They are not only unnecessary; they are positively barriers. We want to get at the drifting world, and to do that we must go out to it, not shut ourselves away from it. In some respects we must be as like it, not as unlike it, as possible. We must follow it up. We must interest it, challenge it, claim it, be stronger than it, lead it. Don't misunderstand me. Churches are good, all good; the very poorest of them, centres of light and sources of comfort; but one of our greatest defects has been our zeal for cages. I remember, years ago, in Leicester, when, season after season, we had our happy and loving gatherings of two or three thousand people, some said, "What will come of it?" meaning—They will not come to chapel when you close the Hall, and they will be heard of no more if you go. The first half of that was quite true, but the second half was not: and here let it be put on record that if the Hall had not been taken from us those gatherings and I would have been in Leicester now. But, even to this day, one can never go near the place without being surrounded with proofs that many things did come of it. In Leicester to-day, many thousands of men are banded together in a very tender and helpful Brotherhood—nothing more beautiful and human in England; and I am assured that the spirit of this is the spirit we knew so well ten years ago; and Leicester is all the saner and happier for this to-day. That is the main thing; and that really counts.

Well then, let us aim at that. We want more churches, and better attended churches; yes, but far before that, we want a saner and happier world. Let us try for it. I should like to see every public hall, every theatre, and every music-hall in England, tenanted on Sunday by bright, simple Humanitarians, not to preach bare doctrine but life, and to give the people the animation and joy of the sense of companionship in looking up together. Let us have all the joyous music we can get, but that need not be put first. Men and women like to hear about kindness, justice, children, the possible honourableness of work, comradeship, and the spirit of helpfulness, the good time coming, the happiness to be found in simple things, and the dear God who breathes and loves and waits for us within and beyond all our sorrows.

Again and again we have proved, that apart from the church and on common ground they will come to such teaching and be thankful. Let us give them the chance. The difficulty is to get at them, to make them really understand what it is they are being invited to; but this can be got over with a little patient and loving work. Nothing sensational is required, no nonsensical "going down to the masses" and "making things popular." The world that is drifting wants and must have our very best, for it is the world's strength that is drifting, not its weakness. It may not be much that we can do, but we ought to do all we can; and anyone who gives his money or his heart and brain and work in this great enterprise is doing God's service indeed.

J. Page Hopps.

Mr. Percy Alden dealt with the problem of the unemployed in a paper which was read on his behalf at a conference of representatives of labour at York on April 9. He advocated the employment of men on productive work, the reclamation of foreshores, reafforestation, cultivation of waste lands, and the establishment of farm or labour colonies by the Government. He suggested the purchase by the State of all the land that had gone out of cultivation or was likely to go out of cultivation. Of land thus obtained plots should be granted with fixity of tenure to working peasants, who would thus become State tenants. These would have to be carefully selected, and would, in the first instance, be agricultural labourers who would otherwise drift to the towns, and a certain number of town dwellers would be found able and willing to return to agricultural work. Such enterprises must be undertaken by the central government with the assistance of local authorities. His proposals were well received.

To the current number of the Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement (office of the Fund, 38, Conduit Street, W. Price, 2s. 6d.), Mr. Herbert Rix contributes some "Notes taken on a Tour in Palestine in the Spring of 1901." Readers of Mr. Rix's article on "The Nazareth Question" in last week's Inquirer will be specially interested in the first note on "Bethlehem of Galilée," which describes a visit to Beit Lahm, seven miles north-west of Nazareth, the Bethlehem of Joshua xix. 15. The present village, Mr. Rix says, is a wretched collection of hovels, with only two or three built of stone, the rest of mud.

The view from the place is charming. The land slopes gently to the south. On the W.S.W. is Carmel, with the "Place of Sacrifice" standing up prominently. From south-west to south-east, beyond the Plain of Esdraelon, extend the blue hills of Samaria. Between the village and the great plain is a strip of slightly-undulating ground, clothed with extensive woods. From E.S.E. to E.N.E. are the hills of Galilee, but Nazareth is not in sight.

Robinson, who discovered Beit Lahm, speaks of it as being "without a trace of antiquity except the name." This, however, is a mistake. Guérin (Galilée, T. I., p. 393) mentions the remains of two ancient buildings. One, "almost entirely destroyed," he believed to be a synagogue, the other a Christian church. The scanty remains of what I suppose to be the former lie on the east of the present village, and consist merely of the bases of five round pillars set in a row, the section of each column measuring 2 feet, and the pillars being 7 feet apart.

There is also an interesting note on "Bethabara," the scene of the Baptism.

The Bi-Centenary of Wesley's birth is to be celebrated by a great festival on June 17th, at Epworth, where Wesley was born in 1703. It is announced that no financial scheme will be promoted; the people will sing and pray and give thanks to God. A stained glass memorial window will be placed in the Epworth Methodist Church.

The Free Methodist (an official organ of the Methodist New Connexion, Methodist Free Church, and Bible Christian Methodist bodies) speaks as follows of Methodist Union.

It is evident from the frequent references to Methodist Union in our columns and elsewhere that the question is exciting a considerable amount of attention. There is a growing anticipation that something practicable is within measurable distance. Many of those who have long looked to the Wesleyan Conference to take the lead in this matter are now coming to the conclusion, somewhat regretfully, that the mother Church of Methodism is not at present prepared to entertain the idea of reunion with her offshoots. . . . The Wesleyans are strong and self-contained. They show no desire for Methodist Union, and the minor Methodist Churches will now do well to leave them out of the reckoning.

In regard to the union of some of the minor Methodist bodies it adds, "The prospect is growing brighter, and we trust no cloud will arise."

At a crowded meeting in the Royal Victoria Hall, Waterloo Bridge-road, held under the auspices of the National Unitarian Temperance Association on Friday, April 17, Rev. F. Allen, of Stamford-street, in the chair, the following resolution was unanimously carried:—"That this meeting emphatically protests against the proposals in Sir Hart Dyke's Bill (to be introduced on May 1) to restrain the justices from rejecting or renewing licenses, a duty favourable to the public good, and called for by public opinion." It was moved by Mr. Fred Maddison, of Wandsworth, and seconded by Mr. Chancellor, of Highgate, in forcible speeches. The orchestra provided music. Miss Bredall and Mrs. Marshall sang appropriate songs, Mrs. R. W. Cox being the accompanist. Mr. W. R. Marshall gave a recitation.

From a recent issue of the Birmingham Gazette we take the following pleasant picture of "a bright spot in the slums":—

Among the many suggestions put forward to combat the drink evil and the congregating of working men in public-houses is that of providing counter-attractions. An instance of this theory put into practice exists in the Domestic Mission carried on under the auspices of the Church of the Messiah in a hall in Lower Fazeley-street, a typical slum district. The interior of the hall is bright and roomy, and social meetings, clubs for men, boys, and girls, and other attractions to appeal to every section of the poorer classes are regularly held here. Paying a promiscuous visit last night, one of the usual people's drawing-rooms was found to be in progress. There was a free-and-easy air about the proceedings and a lack of ceremony which specially appeals to working men and women, of whom there were about 50 present, all decently attired and on their best behaviour. There was nothing goody-goody about the proceedings, for here and there were cosy little groups enjoying a game of chess, dominoes, draughts, or cards, while others, newspapers in hand, discussed the topics of the hour. To vary the amusement the church organist acted as accompanist on the piano to a number of songs, while a friend dropped in with a phonograph and reeled off a dozen or so popular musical selections. During the evening refreshments were served, and from start to finish there was not a dull moment. The Rev. T. Pipe and his wife, who have charge of the mission, acted admirably as host and hostess, and in addition Mr. Arthur Chamberlain, Alderman Martineau, and other visitors fraternised freely with those present. With an extension of this movement many a publican would find his occupation gone.

The late Mr. George Pool Gass, of Bolton, whose death occurred on Sunday, April 12, at the age of eighty-four, had many interesting memories from the early years of his long life. As a boy he was present in the Old Kirk of Annan, Dumfriesshire, of which town he was a native, at the trial and expulsion for heresy of Edward Irving from the Scottish Church, and heard the subsequent field preachings directly after this, and before Irving founded the church that bears his name. He also frequently visited the farm house of the mother of Thomas Carlyle, whom he remembered with much pleasure as a very kind-hearted old lady. Mr. Gass had first joined in Unitarian worship under the ministry of the Rev. George Harris at Moor-lane Chapel, Bolton. Since then he had been a member of the Bank-street Congregation, and was one of the founders and a trustee of Commission-street, now Unity Chapel. At the funeral at Tonge Cemetery, the service was conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, of Bank street Chapel.

SHORT NOTICES.

In her Lombard Studies the Countess Martinengo Cesaresco has given us a delightful book, which will be specially attractive to spring visitors to the Italian lakes. The longest and in many ways the most attractive essay is on the Lake of Garda, which is full of fine sympathy, not only for natural beauty, but also for the life of the people and their legendary lore. Here and there the strong patriotic feeling of the writer for the country of her adoption is allowed to gleam through, as, for instance, when she tells us that she is inclined "to weep for the new generation because it knows nothing of the unselfish enthusiasms of the first three-quarters of the nineteenth century." Arthur Young's North Italian Journey has furnished an unfamiliar subject, and we are grateful for this fresh introduction to the inveterate traveller and observer. Among the other essays we should like to call attention to the one on "The Popular Stage" with its interesting links with the town life of the Middle Ages. The illustrations of the volume, which are numerous and well chosen, have given us special pleasure. It is, in conclusion, very good news to hear upon such excellent authority that soldi is the last thing the Italian peasant thinks of unless he has been spoilt by strangers. Happy the country which has no tourists! (T. Fisher Unwin, crown 8vo, pp. vii. 392. 16s.)

Apostolic Order and Unity, by Robert Bruce, M.A., D.D. This is an examination of the sub-apostolic writings carried out to discover what light they throw on the subject of the present divisions in the Christian Church. The author has no difficulty in showing that, within the period with which he deals, there is no good support for the doctrine of the monarchic Episcopate, or for the claim that apostolic succession is of the essence of the Church. The book can be unreservedly commended as a competent and judicious statement of the evidence, with inferences in favour of the Low Church practice. (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1903. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Gospel of Divine Humanity. A Reconsideration of Christian Doctrine in the Light of a Central Principle, by J. W. Farquhar. The "central principle" is the idea of humanity in its totality as the Body of God. The volume is a third edition, brought out at a low price by a few friends who are interested in the circulation of the work. Some reminiscences by the Rev. G. W. Allen show that Mr. Farquhar was refused admission into the Scotch Presbyterian Church on suspicion of heresy. He went through Swedenborgian, Spiritualist and Atheist phases of thought, but ultimately settled down in a kind of tranquil Universalism, believing that there was something good in every positive opinion. For a number of years he lived in a single room at Hoxton on some small savings, ready to go to the workhouse when they were exhausted, but devoting himself in the meantime to reading and high thinking. (London: Elliot Stock, 1902.)

The Noble Eightfold Path. The James Long Lectures on Buddhism for 1900-1902, by the Rev. W. St. Clair-Tisdall, M.A., C.M.S. This is an account of the Buddha and his teachings, based on a first-hand acquaintance with Buddhist literature. The author has tried to write tolerantly but his conceptions of religion are so limited by his own type of Christianity that he does less than justice to Buddhism. (London: Elliot Stock, 1903. 5s.)

It is with genuine pleasure that we welcome the translation of the Legend of St. Francis by the three Companions from the pen of Miss Salter, which has been published recently in the Temple Classics. (London: J. M. Dent and Co., p. 136. 1s. 6d.) It is strange that no translation has been available before. The Legend is a mere fragment of biography, but its value is great. With the same simple charm of manner which delights us in the Fioretti it has an historical importance which the latter cannot claim. The translation has an archaic flavour which strikes us a; quite suitable because it is never overdones and the ample acknowledgment which is made of the help of Dr. Sebastian Evans in no way detracts from the credit which is due to Miss Salter herself for an excellent piece of work carried out with real literary skill. There are many historical and literary problems connected with the fragment of the work of the Three Companions which have come down to us. Miss Salter has touched upon them slightly in her epilogue. Occasionally some of her statements might be modified with advantage. It is a little rash to assign the Mirror of Perfection so absolutely to the year 1227 as she does on page 118. It strikes us also as a little strange to speak of the Mirror of Perfection, the Little Flowers and the Legend of the Three Companions as the three principal authorities on the life of St. Francis. The value of the Little Flowers from the point of view of history is difficult to determine, fact and fancy are so closely interwoven in its beautiful texture. It cannot certainly be placed in the same category with the First Life by Thomas of Celano, which Miss Salter has forgotten by a strange oversight to place among the primary authorities.

We have received from Messrs. Burns and Oates a translation of the Mirror of Perfection by Constance Countess de la Warr, with an introduction by Father Cuthbert (8vo, pp. XVI. 184. 5s.). We confess that it seems to us a little superfluous, when the work has been done already by Dr. Sebastian Evans with a skill which leaves nothing to be desired. Presumably the present venture is meant for Roman Catholic readers, to whom the publishers' name will be as good as a nihil obstat. Father Cuthbert's introduction is slight in quality, and is inspired too evidently by the desire to confute Sabatier and place the Mirror early in the fourteenth century. The contrast which he draws between it and the Legend of the Three Companions leaves the reader without any clue to the possibility of a close literary relationship. Certainly the eager insistence upon poverty need not be taken as evidence of the influence of later tendencies, unless Father Cuthbert is prepared to deny the primitive character of the Sacrum Commercium, which is now generally accepted. Sabatier assigns this allegorical eulogy of poverty to the year 1227; it contains many passages as vehement in their tendency as anything which can be quoted from the Mirror.

It is written above in glory
Whatever thou wrought'st for me.

—Howe Benning.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

MORE FIRESIDE FABLES.

VI. The Mirror.

A little princess received from her fairy godmother a golden mirror, but she was warned that, to use it rightly, she must look herself fairly in the face; if this were not done, the mirror would lose its power. It seemed to be an easy thing to do, and the mirror was at once the child's delight, and she ran to it always with a smile, but before long the clearness of its rays grew less and less, and at last it was dim, and showed her image no more. Complaining of this, she was told that the mirror had been only half used. Then the princess reflected that, though she had often been naughty, she had never seen herself frown.

VII. Burdens.

A bee and an ant, heavily laden, watched a grasshopper leaping from leaf to leaf. Asked why he did this, the grasshopper explained that he could not bear the thought of having nothing to do. That which you cannot bear must indeed be a load, thought the lookers-on.

VIII. The Kindergarten.

In a corner of a large forest, the young of many animals came together for play. The cubs of lions and bears rolled over one another; toddling elephants gave leopards and panthers rides on their backs; baby serpents twined themselves round the legs of hyenas and wolves; polecats and weasels and stoats played leapfrog; whilst eaglets and owlets got up climbing matches in the trees. Here in the corner they showed each other their good points, but afterwards in the forest all their bad points—the points—of claws and beaks, and talons and teeth and yet wondered why they were no longer friends.

IX. Getting Out of It.

The snake was charged with carrying secret messages across the water to King Log, and was brought before King Stork. The accused made signs which were understood to mean that he wanted to know how he could walk without feet, or fly without wings, or swim without fins, or speak with a tongue that was silent, or hear with ears that were deaf. "I believe," said the king, seizing him, "you would shuffle out of your skin." And he did.

X. A Homely Wit.

The birds in a city aviary were talking of the fine country houses from which they had come.

"My home," said a pie, "was a stately beech."

"And mine," said a daw, "was an ancient oak."

"And mine," said a crow, "was an immemorial elm."

"And mine," said a tit, "was a moss-grown wall."

"And mine," said an owl, "was an ivy-grown keep."

"And mine," said a hawk, "was a towering cliff."

"And mine," said an eagle, "was a cloud-capped peak."

"And mine," said a starling, "was under the thatch, and was none the less home for that."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Glasgow: St. Vincent-street.—On Sunday, April 19, the Sunday-school anniversary was held, when Miss Marian Pritchard, of London (Aunt Amy), conducted the services. In the morning she spoke on "Our Duty and our Privilege," addressing in turn the scholars, the teachers, and the congregation generally. The beauty and simplicity of her language and manner, combined with the deep earnestness of her tone and teaching, awoke in many who were present feelings well calculated to result in the strengthening of character and permanent uplifting of soul. In the evening Miss Pritchard was again the preacher, her subject being, 'For What Principles do we Stand?" Both services were numerously attended, and in the evening especially a large number of strangers were present, to whom was clearly set forth our repudiation of dogma "as a bond of Union," our rejection of External Authority, and our complete faith in spiritual freedom and religious progress under the guidance of the Eternal, revealed in the Reason and Conscience of Man. Miss Pritchard's services were very warmly appreciated.

London: Mansford-street.—On Tuesday, April 28, the Rev. J. Page Hopps will hold a short service and deliver a lecture on "What is Civilisation, and have we got it?"

London: Stepney.—On Saturday evening, the 18th inst., the last free concert of the season was held. An excellent programme of music was given by friends from Leytonstone Congregational Church. On Sunday, the 19th, at the P.S.A., Mr. George Ward gave an interesting account of "Edna Lyall and her Books." At 7.30 a special musical service was held, when the Finchley Glee Union rendered Mendelssohn's "Hear My Prayer," and selections from Stainer's "Crucifixion." There was a large audience, which thoroughly enjoyed the impressive music.

Norwich.—The Octagon Chapel Guild of Service, which has now a membership of 100, held its first public service in the chapel on Easter Sunday in the afternoon. It was resolved that it should be of a charitable nature, and the members were requested to bring contributions of eggs. Four hundred and twenty, including sixty Easter eggs, were collected and placed on the Communion Table. Afterwards they were sent to the inmates and children of the Workhouse. Addresses were delivered by the Warden, the Rev. Alfred Hall, and the Chairman of the Chapel Committee, Mr. G. A. King. The service, though novel, was of a very impressive character. On Easter Tuesday and Wednesday some of the members acted The Lady of Lyons. The play was managed by Mr. J. W. Prime, one of the sub-wardens, and those who took part made their own costumes, paying careful regard to the dress of the period. The effort was greatly appreciated, and resulted in a net profit of £9, which was handed over to the School Building Fund.

Richmond.—The first sessional meeting of the newly-formed Boys' Guild of the Richmond Free Church was held in the "Workshop" on Thursday evening for the purpose of presentation of prizes to the successful competitors of the literary section by Lady Wilson. There was a good attendance of members and friends of the movement; great interest was shown in the object and aims of the young society. Specimens of the work of the craft section were ranged at the side of the room on the benches (all of which have been made by the members). Useful advice and hints were given by Sir Rowland and Lady Wilson and others. The society seems to shape well for the future, and shows every sign of being a most useful branch of the church work. The motto of the new guild is "Simplicity, Sincerity, and Service."

South Shields.—On Easter Tuesday the anniversary tea and meeting of the above church took place, there being a very fair attendance, including friends from Newcastle, Sunderland, and Gateshead. Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P. (President of the Northumberland and Durham Christian Association), presided at the evening meeting, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. Frank Walters and Francis Wood, Councillor R. Affleck, J.P., and others. The anniversary services were conducted on Sunday last by the Rev. H. Cross, of Stockton, the morning subject being "Blighting and Redeeming Ideal," and in the evening "Vision and Work." The attendances were above the average, and Mr. Cross's discourses were much appreciated.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Sunday, April 5, the Rev. H. Rawlings, of York, preached on the occasion of the Sunday-school anniversary.

In the Press, nearly ready, with about Eighty Illustrations, crown 8vo, cloth, 5s., Authorised Translation of

BABEL AND BIBLE

By Dr. FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH, Professor of Assyriology in the University of Berlin. Being Lectures delivered before Members of the Oriental Society in the presence of the German Emperor. Rev. C. H. W. JOHNS, of Queen's College, Cambridge, will edit the Volume and write an Introduction.

These are the Lectures which have caused such a sensation in Germany, and which called forth the letters from the German Emperor on the Inspiration of the Old Testament.

They explain in a clear and popular manner the universal importance of the discoveries made in Babylonia, and demonstrate the influence which Babylonish laws and thought must have had on the writers of the books of the Old Testament.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

Sunday Afternoon Stories for Home and School.

By Dr. EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

In 2 vols. Price 2s. each net.
Postage 3d. each vol., or 4d. for the two Vols.

The Author says: "Friends have suggested to me that a book of Stories to be read aloud or to be read week by week in Schools, perhaps in Sunday Schools, best of all to be read in that happy twilight of Sunday evening, when the children gather at home around father and mother, would be of interest, perhaps of value."

These two volumes will be found useful as furnishing illustrative matter for Teachers. The stories are especially suitable for reading and re-telling.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

STUDIES of SOME of SHAKSPERE'S PLAYS.

BY REV. FRANK WALTERS.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 1/6 net. Postage 3d.

This New Edition contains an additional Chapter on "The Genius of Shakspere."

"The studies of these famous dramas are all of them so good that it is really invidious to select one rather than another for special praise."—LITERARY WORLD.

"Mr. Walters writes instructively, intelligently, and above all, in complete sympathy with his subject. In a book of no great size or pretensions he has managed to condense the thoughts evidently of years. It is altogether an excellent contribution to Shaksperian literature.—NEWCASTLE CHRONICLE."

OF

UNITARIAN, LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, FREE CHRISTIAN, PRESBYTERIAN, and other NON-SUBSCRIBING or KINDRED CONGREGATIONS.

EIGHTH TRIENNIAL MEETING AT LIVERPOOL.

APRIL 21—24, 1903.

A PLEA FOR A WORSHIPFUL CHURCH.

BY THE REV. JOHN HUNTER, D.D.

It was a distinguished scholar of the American section of the denomination of Christians to which many of you belong who once said, referring to his early connection with King's Chapel, Boston, "I thank God that I was brought up in a worshipful church—a church whose atmosphere was that of reverence, piety and prayer."

It is almost impossible to over-value the worshipful function of the organised religious community—the element and atmosphere of worship in our churches. There are other tests of the worth and service of a church to human needs, but there is not a truer and loftier one than its worshipful quality and influence. It is good to hear a church praised for its humanitarian zeal and activity, or for its wise and helpful teaching and preaching, but the best thing that can be said of it is that those who tread its courts are drawn thither mostly by love of its prayers and praises, of its devotional observances and associations—which quicken and nourish holy aspiration and purpose, and are the channel of influences which inspire and hallow the life.

In his famous and epoch-making address to a class of divinity students well-nigh seventy years ago Emerson said, that the hold public worship had on men was gone or is going! It was not the first nor the last time that a passing mood has been mistaken for an inevitable and permanent tendency. There are at least a few things which do not change in seventy or in seven hundred years—things which are as old and as new as the spring flowers we see breaking from the earth this April day. The instincts and impulses which in the days of our fathers and in the old time before them moved men not only to offer prayer in retirement, but to seek God in company, are not accidental and transitory, but constant elements of human life and growth. They require and ever find truer and better expression and satisfaction, but we do not lose them, save as we lose our capacity for deep feeling and grow insensible to great human needs and experiences. A quickened and deepened spiritual life and a finer wisdom will ever bring us back to the temple and altar of God.

In one of George Eliot's letters may be found this sentence: "One wants a temple beside the out-door temple—a place where human beings do not ramble apart, but meet with a common impulse." Our churches exist to meet and satisfy this yearning of the religious soul and of every soul in its most religious moments; and when they are what they ought to be they will in all their associations conduce to reverent and exalted feeling and thought, be friendly to quietness of spirit and communion with the unseen, be sanctuaries on whose threshold we may always meet the best suggestions and persuasions, and within whose walls we can nourish without hindrance those affections and sentiments which idealise our common life, and which it is the supreme anxiety of serious men everywhere to preserve unsoiled and unhurt amid earthly contact and strife.

Worship is the Chief End of the Church.

The subject we are considering has received of late years a large share of attention, yet it seems to me still necessary to lay stress on worship as the one special thing for which church doors stand open—worship to which architecture, music, hymn, canticle, sermon, sacrament, speech and silence ought all to contribute, and to contribute directly. Many of us require to remember that the churches are not responsible for all the interests of mankind. They must not, it is true, be partial and fanatical, but in these days of scattered and manifold ecclesiastical activity, they may with profit ask themselves whether their universality need take the form of meddling with so many things in their separate and secular aspects, and of seeking to cover a wide variety of interests at the cost of neglecting, more or less, their own distinctive work. It is good to amuse and entertain people, to care for the physical conditions of their existence, and to contribute to the solution of pressing social and political problems, and the influence of a truly worshipful and Christian church will be to stimulate and strengthen men to do that kind of work in the world, and to lend a hand wherever their brethren are at a disadvantage in the struggle for existence and in the attainment of good. People, however, can do political and educational work through political and educational institutions and agencies, and the means of recreation and amusement can be found in abundance almost everywhere. There is little need for our churches as churches to turn from their proper work to supply these things, or to give them any very large place in their limited opportunity. In this age of specialisation they must seek to find their strength more and more in the concentration of their powers in channels definitely religious and in keeping to the lines of the most complete conservation of spiritual influence. They will best meet and adjust themselves to modern conditions and needs by being made to stand for more, not less, as religious institutions. It is not their chief end to gather crowds and to fill buildings with people who only want a penny-show of music or eloquence. To make the attraction of the church love of pleasure, music, anecdote, oratory, will foster an ideal of the church which must in time destroy its whole spiritual power and influence. A church worthy to be called a church ministers to no frivolous feeling or worldly expectancy, it meets those who gather in its sanctuary, not as people who want to be pleased or entertained that they may come again or keep together, but as spiritual and immortal beings, seeking the inspirations of faith and hope, the sense of Divine and eternal relationships, the love of God, the grace of Christ and the communion of the Holy Spirit. The churches need have no fear of the results of persistent and intense devotion to the one work to which they are called and which they can do best. Much of the indifference to religious observances which is complained of is, I am persuaded, indifference to what has been tried and found wanting, to worship that is not worshipful, to preaching that has no touch of inspiration in it, and to membership in religious communities that quickens no sense of fellowship with the whole family of God on earth and in heaven. Instead of speaking, as Emerson did in his earlier years, of the hold which public worship has on men as gone or going, I rather feel compelled to say that churches where the idea of worship is magnified and made honourable were never so attractive to serious minds, and were never so much required as they are now amid the rush and noise of our modern life. It is not as a part of the world we need the church, but as a refuge from the world—as a fortress against those mighty forces that make for the vulgarisation of life, as the home and school of those thoughts and affections which keep us to our best, and redeem and hallow all common things and common days.

Channels of Religious Inspiration.

How to make our churches truly worshipful churches is a problem of supreme and pressing importance. The questions between different schools of Biblical criticism and theology are in comparison little more than academic disputations. We cannot live by the word of knowledge alone, and still less by dry and doubtful discussions. And for religious instruction, as distinct from religious impression and inspiration, men are no longer dependent on their churches and ministers. The prophet and the priest have as commanding a place as ever in the church, but not the mere Sunday lecturer or teacher. Much of our preaching is a survival from the time when there were no printing press, no libraries, and no books for the multitude. Necessity is no longer laid upon the pulpit to convey a kind of information concerning Biblical and theological matters which is now accessible to all classes in cheap primers and commentaries. On the other hand, no amount of the best religious literature can supersede the necessity of common worship, diminish the significance of the services of the church as channels of religious inspiration, or even limit that wonderful element of personality by which the spiritual direction and elevation of life seem so often, humanly speaking, to depend upon those who speak with that power of prophetic vision and experience which distinguishes the sermon from the lecture or oration, making it one with the sanctities of prayer and a veritable message of God to man.

In the Protestant, especially in the non-Episcopal Churches, the least developed function hitherto has been the function of worship. In an old dictionary of "Universal Information" you may have seen two woodcuts representing Pagan and Christian worship. The ignorant Pagan is represented as kneeling on the ground before an ugly idol, while the enlightened Christian is seated comfortably in a pew listening to a sermon. That is not altogether caricature. It represents the penalty which has been paid for the life and energy which have gone into great and necessary protests. Protests, however noble and earnest, are never the expression of the whole truth on any subject. Extreme begets extreme. Luther and Catherine his wife seemed to themselves to pray less after they had broken with the old church than before; and from that day to our day it has been the besetting temptation of the Protestant Churches to fail to use even as means and helps what in their ignorance and superstition men had formerly regarded as ends. The reaction against form and symbolism went too far—a reaction which has robbed public worship for generations of many helpful and beautiful usages, and by the exaggerated importance attached to creed and sermon and the intellectual aspects of religion generally, has done much to drive devotion and poetry out of the churches, to convert the temple into a lecture hall, praise and prayer into preliminaries, and what ought to be an assembly of worshippers into an audience more or less critical, or into a mere mob of spectators and hearers.

The Freest Church may be most Worshipful.

I am, of course, as far as anyone from joining in the cry for less preaching. Let us improve the quality of our preaching if we can, but let us not resort to the foolish and feeble alternative of underrating its functions and possibilities. Preaching spread Christianity at the beginning, and every epoch of revival and reformation has been an epoch of preaching. It is of the falsehood of extremes we need to beware. It has often been said that Roman Catholicism brings men to their knees, and that Protestantism brings them back again to their feet. But both attitudes are everlastingly true, and necessary for our humanity. The mediæval saints were ignorant of much that we know; but are we not in danger of losing much that they felt? It is possible, I know, to welcome and love all the new light of this new day of Christ and yet to keep the old regard for devout and reverent observances and ways. I fail to see any reason in the nature of things why the freest Churches should not also be the most worshipful Churches. The new heavens and the new earth of modern knowledge give us more, and not less, reasons for worship. To unite mind and heart, soul and strength, in the love and worship of God is the work and the characteristic of the reconciling and catholic Church which our religious times urgently require.

The Need of Imagination.

The poet Coleridge, it is said, left the Unitarian body—of which he was for a short time minister, or preacher—because it was deficient in imagination, which he judged, and rightly judged, to be a most important element in organised religious life and culture. He would have left all the Puritan Churches for the same reason, for they were all alike suffering from the same poverty and prosaic stupor of the imagination both in their teaching and ritual. It was the old watchword of Protestantism, "Religion is spirit," "Worship is spirit," and it was necessary truth in its time. We now need to say, that if the body without the spirit is dead, so the spirit without the body is impotent. It is time the Free Churches of England had outgrown their fear of everything Roman or Anglican. The darkness is not all in one place, nor is the light. No great development of religion can be entirely erroneous or mistaken. Christendom had not been proceeding on altogether wrong and false lines till the Reformers and Puritans appeared. The whole truth concerning the worship of the Church is not with one age or party any more than is the whole truth concerning the faith or government of the Church. In our zeal against excessive or superstitious ritual we have been betrayed into an anti-ritualism which is just as evil. Even in his own day Luther had to check the intemperate zeal of Protestant despisers of forms and ordinances as firmly as he had opposed Roman Catholic abuses. "Do not listen to the devil," he said, "when he opens his big mouth calling out, 'Spirit! Spirit!' and then breaks down all the bridges by which the spirit can enter." "There is a superstition," Lord Bacon says, "in avoiding superstition." Let us seek to see things in their true perspective. Must we always oscillate between extremes? Let the multitude of years teach wisdom. Let us not cast out as evil that which only requires correction and guidance, or to be filled with a truer and larger thought and spirit. Let us not confound an intelligent and chastened use of ritual with sacerdotalism, or raise the stupid cry of "No Popery" when nothing more is intended than a return to practices which the Universal Church has sanctioned, and even Knox and Luther and Calvin approved. Let us not give over to error and superstition the monopoly of beautiful and helpful symbolism. Simplicity is not baldness and coarseness; and modes of worship bare and inartistic, calculated to starve rather than nourish the sentiments, are not necessarily pure and spiritual. Æstheticism is not the ideal any more than asceticism, but it is right that our worship and all its accessories should participate in sincere and dignified ways in our general culture. Our offices of worship must be framed to meet the wants and sympathies and aspirations of more than one type of mind, character and experience. The city of God has twelve gates, and the ways of the spirit are many. We must no longer send to other communions those who crave for more reverent and orderly modes of worship. For it is not always social fashion, or love of music or a languid liking for ecclesiastical performances which draw many from our Free Churches to the Episcopal communion, with all its mediævalism, dogmatism and exclusive assumptions, but the need of more helpful and satisfying worship than can be found in the churches of their childhood and youth. The Free Churches of England ought to have the best ritual of worship. It is part of our Christian liberty to be able to rise superior to tradition and custom, even to our own traditions and customs. We have the freedom of Christendom; but we might as well be bound hand and foot, if we are not making full use of our freedom to realise the idea of a Church more simply and comprehensively Christian, and more worshipful in all its observances and ways.

More Living Forms of Worship.

In all branches of the Christian Church things seem to be working toward a great reconstruction; and the non-Episcopal Churches are taking up gratefully and reverently devotional aids which the fathers flung away. But much (O how much!) remains to be done, and what has been done here and there is little more than suggestive and tentative. Now and always we must lay the supreme emphasis upon the truth and spirit of worship; there must be nothing insincere, nothing sensuous, nothing merely mechanical and showy if the best results are to be obtained; but between truth and ritual, spirit and form, there need be no strife, but the most perfect harmony. The question of the purity or spirituality of worship is not determined by the forms used, be they simple or elaborate, plain or beautiful, but by the spirit of the people using them. We can be formal in the rejection of forms, and be as superstitiously attached to a few dull and bare forms as to a more dignified ritual. Without spiritual life uncircumcision avails just as little as circumcision. Wisely as we may speak against dependence upon forms, it is well to remember that there is equal danger in independence of forms. What is more common and sad, for example, than the slow and utter decay of the prayerful spirit where all formal prayer is neglected or renounced. To care for form for form's sake is foolish, but to care for form for the sake of the spirit it expresses, preserves and nourishes, is heavenly wisdom. Let us believe both in spirit and in form, and seek to give to each its proper place and value. It is the perfection of art, we have been told, to have a perfect command of forms, and it is also the perfection of worship. The wisest Church is the Church that pays the finest justice and the most impartial and perfect respect to these two eternal factors in life and religion — spirit and form; and it is the Church which will hold the best place, do the best work and exert the best influence for the longest period of time.

To develop the worship-side of Church life, to correct what requires to be corrected, to enrich what is poor and fulfil what is partial, we must chiefly depend on the inculcation of first and great truths. Give to men truer and nobler thoughts of the worship of the Church, the right conception and the right spirit of it, the right attitude of mind and heart toward it, and much that now prevents the worthy realisation of the ideal of a worshipful Church will pass away; the outward forms and features of worship will come more and more into accord with its meaning and dignity, and men will feel in simple ways the importance of everything which is connected with the offices of prayer and praise, and which in any manner or degree hinders or assists them. Indeed, nothing short of a clear and general recognition of the idea that public worship is the symbolic expression of something which all men owe to God will give it power over men and restore to the Church the rightful and natural authority which in many places it has lost. Worship is a duty which is involved in all our relations to God, and binding upon men everywhere who know God to be their Creator and Preserver, their moral Lord and Judge, their Father and Saviour, and the Holy Spirit of their hidden life. It is because people fail to look upon the worship of the Church in the light of a sacred obligation, and think of it as something which rests almost entirely upon private taste, private inclination, private want, that the Church is so widely regarded as an institution to be patronised if its attractions, social, intellectual, oratorical, musical, are sufficient, or a bye-interest or bye-play whose claims may be lightly set aside as soon as they come into conflict with more absorbing interests and pleasures.

Worship not Self-seeking, but Self-surrender.

It is a prevalent idea even among serious persons that the supreme object or end of worship is to receive benefits and favours for themselves, to be pleased and helped by hymn and music, prayer and sermon, or at the most to offer petitions for "those things which are requisite and necessary as well for the body as the soul." But an audience met to look and listen, or even a company of devout people met for supplication, seeking their God only for what they can get, cannot be truthfully described as a congregation of worshippers. Attendance on the services of the church ought not, of course, to be insisted on apart from those natural conditions upon which edification depends. A Church that does not furnish helpful worship and helpful teaching has no claims on anyone's allegiance. And while petition has a rightful and large place in the prayers of the sanctuary, it is not all. The supreme and final purpose of the worship of the Church is not our pleasure or profit, but the glory of God. Let the first things therefore be first in our regard—adoration, gratitude, praise, submission, consecration; the rising above ourselves in the worship of the eternal goodness—our human response to the Divine perfection—the going out of ourselves in humble thanksgiving to God for his great and undeserved mercies; the giving of ourselves in solemn acts of dedication to do and to bear God's holy and blessed will. In its central idea our worship is an offering and a sacrifice. Our prayer and praise, our adoration and thanksgiving, our reverence for the Divine majesty, our trust in the Divine goodness and grace, our penitence and aspiration, one submissive spirit, our filial affection, our fraternal sympathy, our consecration to a life of Divine obedience and human service take the place of the bleeding and smoking victims of Pagan and Jewish altars. And unless we offer this reasonable and spiritual sacrifice and yield ourselves to God, there is nothing in the public acts of religion in which we may take more or less a formal part that at all answers to the worship of God in spirit and in truth, and nothing to make us recipients of that Divine benediction which belongs to the worship of the Church as something distinct from private worship, for here as everywhere, to receive we must have, to get we must give, and what costs us nothing is worth to us just what it costs.

But our worship is not merely a duty which we owe to God, but something in which He himself finds joy. You remember the old mediæval story which Browning has retold in our time as "a romance of deep truth," of the young monk Theocritus and his boyish hymn, "his little human praise," which God missed amid the hallelujahs of saints and angels. It is only a legend, but it brings us nearer, I am persuaded, to the Divine reality of things than representations of Deity which we may think grander and more philosophical. Let us not misjudge God. He may be more than "personal," but He is not less; more than man, but not less; and without feeling, and the love which craves for answering love, He would surely be less than man. The God whom Jesus Christ reveals is not beyond caring for our reverence and trust, our gratitude and love. A universe of passionless worlds cannot compensate for the loss of His children's worship. Because He is Eternal Goodness and Fatherhood, He misses our little human praise, our confidence, our affection, our obedience. And when we worship in spirit and in truth we not only draw nigh to Him, but He draws nigh to us, and we grow wise with His wisdom, strong with His strength, peaceful with His peace, blessed with His blessedness. Many ways He has, known and unknown, of drawing near to His children, but if we listen to the voice of the spiritual experience of mankind, then are we led to believe and expect that we shall become conscious of a deeper and more intimate communion with God when we seek Him in the company of our brethren than when we seek Him alone, that though His grace is not confined to ecclesiastical channels, yet blessings are given in the Church which are not given outside, that He whose paths are in the deep waters, and whose footsteps are not known, has still His way in the sanctuary.

True Union in Common Prayer.

We have much to gain, I am persuaded, by getting the members of our congregations to consider more thoughtfully and earnestly than the vast mass of them have ever yet done, what is meant by this act and experience we call public worship; that it is not only a great stimulus to personal devoutness and renders possible an active and exalted condition of the religious affections rarely reached in solitude, that it is not only the crown and perfection of all worship, private and domestic, but that it has a special significance and blessing of its own. It is in its essence, not the act of an individual or a collection of individuals, but the act of a body or brotherhood. It rests upon that real and actual fellowship of men, revealed to the world by Jesus Christ, in one common filial relationship to Almighty God, our Heavenly Father. It is something therefore which we cannot offer at all singly, or privately. When we meet in the public sanctuaries of our religion, with a congregation of two or three, or two or three hundred, or two or three thousand, it is not as separate beings we meet, with separate thoughts and feelings and wants, but as sons and daughters of the household of God, not to pray private prayers and express private convictions, but to join in a worship that has a representative character, to join in the adorations, the thanksgivings, the confessions, the aspirations, the supplications, the intercessions of the Universal Church.

It is necessary, therefore, that the forms of our worship should as much as possible represent this fellowship, that they should not be individualistic or sectarian, peculiarly modern or mediæval, or primitive, but catholic in the best sense; that they should have as little in them as is possible of what divides; that there should be no definitions and explanations where there ought only to be invocation, adoration, supplication—the expression in simple and undogmatic language of the trusts and hopes, the aspirations and needs, the affections and fidelities of the religious and Christian soul. In all the highest acts thought must go along with feeling, head with heart; the spirit of truth and the spirit of prayer must not be two but one; yet it is communion of spiritual desire, affection and experience, and not identity of opinion, that is the real and supreme bond of worship. When worshipping together in the church it is not necessary to declare in prayer or hymn or formal creed what we think or believe on a variety of more or less inscrutable subjects. It is in God, not in theories about God, in Christ, not in theories about Christ, we meet and are one. To have to attach private meanings to petitions in prayers, to lines in hymns and psalms and to clauses in recited creeds while we are engaged in solemn acts of worship is to put an unnecessary strain on the mind and conscience, and when done regularly must have a demoralising effect. "Liturgies and public forms of service," said John Hales of Eton in 1642, "ought to be so framed as they admitted not of particular and private fancies, but contained only such things as in which all Christians do agree. Then men of different opinion would be able to hold communion in sacris, and go to one church."

The Universal Element in Public Prayer.

But, on the other hand, it is not necessary in public as in private worship to individualise the language of prayer and praise, or to refuse to use words of thanksgiving and confession because they express a feeling and faith higher, deeper, and larger than what we each singly may possess. In the church we ought to be able to rise above the petty self-consciousness which is the bane of our life everywhere, and to feel that we are part of the great solidarity of religious and Christian souls, members of the universal Church of Christ and of the one family of God on earth and in heaven. Common worship, surely, ought not to be an impossible or even a very difficult ideal to those who have everything in common, save a few superficial and transitory things; a common humanity, a common divinity, a common origin and home in God's Fatherhood, a common need of heavenly care and discipline and guidance, of redeeming mercy, and of holy quickening and inspiration. It may be well also to bear in mind, when so many are inclined to make much more of practical philanthropy than of worship in the life of the Church, that nothing enables men to realise their common brotherhood like common worship, the serious recognition and confession of the same Divine relationships, obligations and needs. In finding God we find ourselves, and also our brethren.

Give of the Best for Worship.

If the conception of the meaning and function of the worship of the Church be such as I have said, then it follows that we are bound by every right consideration to give careful and constant attention to all those conditions, methods, and details of methods upon which depend the practical efficiency of such a great and lofty human interest, and which are necessary to give to our worship its becoming dignity and grace, and its best impressiveness and influence. A worshipful Church, like all best things, is an ideal, but an ideal we must always have in view, and be seeking persistently in every way open to us to realise. We must not grudge pains and patience, and the giving of thought and time to many things which, considered by themselves, may seem insignificant and trifling. In the Hebrew Tabernacle not only the seven-branched candlesticks, but the tongs and the snuffers were made of "gold, and that pure gold." In like manner everything in and about our churches ought to be as good and perfect as we can make it—it ought to be our best. We must not dismiss from serious regard what is secondary and subordinate because here and there it is made unduly prominent and important. Let us be wise with the wisdom of Christ who had nothing to say against the tithing of mint and anise and cumin, if the weightier matters of the law were not neglected, and who exhorted his disciples to be faithful in the least as in the greatest things. To secure reverent worship we must not regard anything as trifling. To trifle here is to do what would belittle the majesty of man's communion with God. The small and the great things, the outward and the inward things, are all part of the one thing. Spiritual worship has its external as well as its internal side, and may suffer as much from too little as from excessive attention to details.

The Church Building.

In the construction, design and decoration of the church building, the controlling idea ought to be the idea of worship. Without and within it should be symbolic of its great religious purpose, and be planned throughout with a view to religious impression. After consulting security and certain utilities, the question to be asked of every proportion, form, colour, light, shadow, pillar, symbol, is—will it assist the worship? Every one of its interior arrangements ought to make it plain that it is not a hall for the ordinary and varied purposes of collective secular life, for public meetings, lectures and concerts, but a sanctuary, and nothing else.

It is the witness of experience—of a long and wide experience—that art may be of service in religion, that buildings may help the worship, that the mind may be spoken to through the eye as well as through the ear, that the suggestions of the church edifice may appeal to and stimulate the spiritual imagination and be the allies of reverence and aspiration. It is not of art we need be afraid, only of its one-sided and selfish culture. A beautiful church may be the least of all aids to worship, but it is an aid, and an aid which ought to be seriously sought and gratefully accepted. Good sermons may be more impressive than symbols and pictures, but there is no reason why we should not, in our Church life as in our domestic and civic life, avail ourselves of all the best offices of art and add to the exhortations of the living preacher the silent eloquence of suggestive mural decorations and pictures, and of windows aflame with parable and allegory. It was an ancient custom to adorn the walls of the sanctuary with pictorial illustrations of the great events of Biblical and Church history; and our fathers, though they would have none of the ecclesiastical painting and sculpture, had their own undivine decorations, and were not slow in erecting marble slabs to the honour and glory of departed pastors and elders. Why are we so suspicious and afraid of the symbol of the Cross in our Free Churches? To all truly Christian souls it is the great symbol of Christianity—recalling the passion and sacrifice of our Lord and the deepest idea of the Christian life. Is the abuse of a symbol sufficient reason for its abandonment? If it is, where are we to stop? Bible and Sacrament have been even more abused. A superstitious Church in a superstitious age may have abused all these outward modes of religious impression, but it does not follow that an enlightened Church in an enlightened age should not avail itself of the power of picture and symbol to help devout feeling and thought. Without a parable or picture Jesus spake not to his disciples, and without a universe of symbols or pictures Deity is still the unknown and unknowable. God speaks to man not only through his head, but through his heart and imagination; and the Church of God must touch our higher nature at every point and not treat anything which God hath cleansed and sanctified as common and unclean. Emerson somewhere says that great statues and paintings in private houses and galleries have got into the wrong place, and should be removed to where they can teach the people their lessons of truth and beauty. The church is the natural house of art, of sacred painting and of sacred music, and noble religious pictures are just as much out of place in galleries crowded with Venuses and the like, as sacred music is in our secular concert-halls, where one may hear, if he can endure it, the grandest and most thrilling passages of the Bible sung for purposes of entertainment, and greeted with applause.

Interior Arrangements.

In the furniture and interior arrangement and decoration of the church everything ought to be avoided that does not harmonise with its worshipful purpose and associations. Whether formally consecrated or not, everything ought to feel consecrated and be favourable to reverence. Even the faintest suggestions of the lyceum, the music-hall, or theatre ought to be avoided. The choir gallery behind the pulpit may not be, as someone has said, "an invention of the devil," but it is the height of vulgarity. The choir-seat requires to be a little elevated, but not so elevated as to give the impression that the singers are not fellow-worshippers with the congregation, but are up there on exhibition. The pulpit ought to be reserved exclusively for preaching. There ought to be the low-placed desk and lectern for prayer and the reading of the Scriptures. In these acts the minister ought not to be too prominent. When leading in prayer he ought to be near the people and almost on their level—as becometh a fellow-worshipper. It is only a symbol, but a very appropriate and beautiful symbol, which places the pulpit a little to one side, and gives to the Table of Communion the central place—a place which it ought to have, at least in the thought and feeling of all Churches which gather around Jesus Christ and own in Him

The Light, the Truth, the Way.

You may think that all this savours of Ritualism, but it is surely no more Ritualism than the common Nonconformist fashion of making pulpit or organ so central that they look as if they were the be-all and end-all of the church. I am pleading for the simple ritual of the church in opposition to the ritual of the lecture or concert-hall. The usages I have ventured to indicate are not only beautiful and dignified, but intrinsically true and good, spiritually suggestive and impressive, and capable of adaptation to the simplicity of Free Church worship. The environment, we are told, everywhere reacts upon the life. We are all taught, more or less, by object-lessons, and by many the outward and visible signs are absolutely needed.

The Associations of Worship.

Further, I plead not only that all the arrangements of the church building should be suggestive of worship, but that all its associations should be worshipful. The educational value of surroundings is being emphasised just now in so many directions that I feel we must not lose sight of it in connection with our churches. We are creatures of association, and the associations of noisy public meetings, and of the entertainments that pass for religious activities in these days, will not help, but hinder, the best service which the church building can be made to render to men. Let us not demean our churches by putting them to all sorts of uses. Let us have a few places where the world in the vulgar sense is not even suggested—places in the crowded and noisy haunts of men kept open exclusively for purposes of devout worship and devout silence, places that have always in them the atmosphere of prayer and meditation, that recall thoughts of God and Christ and the deeper realities of life, that give a finer turn and tone to our feelings, and have the power to make us forget, if only for a single moment, earthly care and passion and strife. There is not a shadow of superstition in what I am urging as to the consecration and sanctity of buildings, only a recognition of the power of association, which is one of the most powerful and subtle of our mental conditions. Our freer and larger thought of things is being wrongly used when it makes us do an injustice to the sentiments and feelings that made the dust of Zion dear to the Jews, and made the Son of God weep over Jerusalem. Let us not think that we have outgrown these feelings and sentiments. It is just possible that we have not grown into them. The average Englishman has too little sentiment, and the little he has is generally connected with the anniversary of his own birth and wedding, and finds expression only in extraordinary eating and drinking. The power of association may become tyrannical, but in regard to sacred buildings English Nonconformists are not in the least danger at present of yielding themselves too much to its influence.

Church Manners.

To be able to realise in any worthy way the ideal of a worshipful Church much attention requires to be given by the worshippers to their Church manners—to what is proper and becoming before, and during, and after such a solemn engagement as the worship of God. The behaviour of many people in the House of God is not only undevotional, but vulgar and ill-bred. It is as if they did not know and had not been taught the first and simplest lessons about the Church and its worship. Entering into church late, and with, perhaps, a careless or bustling air; taking and leaving their places without any apparent reverence; nodding and smiling, whispering and chattering just before and after service; clearing the throat or nose during prayer and sermon, and sometimes in a way that would cause more than a mild surprise even in a friend's drawing-room; the sitting bolt-upright with open and staring eyes when confessions, thanksgivings and intercessions are being presented in their name to God; lounging instead of kneeling at prayer; standing during praise with one or two hands deep in trouser-pockets; the restless looking about and fumbling and fingering of books; much occupation with the dress and demeanour of fellow-worshippers; the twisting and turning of necks and heads, and general distraction if a door creeks, or a book falls, or a child cries, or a person walks down the aisle going out; the listening to the discourse almost watch in hand; the putting on of gloves and coats and other articles of dress during the closing hymn and benediction; slipping and skulking out of church for no sufficient reason before the dismissal; the rush to the door as if ninety minutes were too prodigal an expenditure of time on the things of eternity; these are but a few of the glaring faults which every one, young and old, ought to avoid. The other summer at Dresden I observed again and again how even careless and noisy sightseers uncovered their heads and were subdued and silent when they entered the little room of the picture gallery where stands alone in its sweet and solemn beauty Raffaele's "Sistine Madonna." There ought to be at least the same hushed feeling in the house of prayer, and there would be if people only realised the meaning of it all. Many even do not give the worship a chance. I have often to conduct worship in places where the first part of the service is well-nigh over before all the people are gathered and settled in their pews, and everything is favourable to calm and serious feeling and reflection. Occasional late attendance may be unavoidable, but as a regular thing, except in the case of a very few, it is wholly unjustifiable. To have the mind composed to thought and prayer and ready to rise on the wings of devotion, it is necessary for one to be in his place a few minutes before the service begins. People who arrive late, not only disturb others and break a stillness that should be unbroken and solemn during the whole service, but by losing the opening acts of worship they wrong themselves and fail in the manifestation of that reverence which is the instinct of the devout heart. The old words, "I will not give unto the Lord my God of that which costs me nothing," are words which set forth in sublime simplicity a principle of unchanging value which applies to Christian as well as to the ancient Hebrew worship and to our personal preparation for that worship. It seems easy, fatally easy, to take part in a public religious service, easy to join in hymn and psalm and prayer, to listen to words of exhortation, and to receive the Holy Supper of the Lord; yet it is not easy to enter into the meaning and spirit of these different acts of worship. The worshipful affections and sentiments—reverence, gratitude, penitence, aspiration, trust, self-surrender, love to God, love to Christ, love to man, the sense of our relationship to God and to the whole family of God on earth and in heaven—are not feelings that can be summoned into existence or exercised at will, but like all our finest affections and sentiments they cannot be had or kept without constant care and culture. The customs of our godly forefathers of observing Saturday evening as a time of preparation for the Sunday—a time for the recollection and meditation which fit one for sacred engagements, is not a custom that is ever likely to be restored—but we need its reminder—that the worthy worship of God in His Church is something that requires every faculty of mind, and soul and body in its best estate.

We need to impress upon the members of our congregation the duty of presenting not only their spirits but their bodies as part of their living sacrifice. To the intelligent person who understands the relations of the inner and outer life, movements and attitudes in the house of prayer will not appear to be trifles. Outward reverence is the protection of the worshipful spirit as outward decency is the safe-guard of personal purity. Outward and visible signs react upon feeling and character, and so closely are they connected that for the most part they live and die together. Even if the ideal of Christian worship be, as some maintain, the domestic ideal, yet respect and reverence are essential elements even of that ideal, and in the finer intercourse between parents and children much depends on the observance of form. Neglect of the symbols of affection and respect comes, not from the abundance, but from the lack of the filial spirit.

Reverence of Demeanour.

Becoming and reverent behaviour in church is vital to the best development and influence of Church worship. Ministers, elders, deacons, wardens, sidesmen and sextons, as well as the people in general, have much to learn and much to unlearn. It ought to go without saying that the minister ought to be reverent in his whole demeanour and behaviour, and by looks, tones, gestures and movements, as well, as by words, "minister" reverence to the worshippers. Reverence which is the primary and essential sentiment of religion, and the finest grace of character, is the most indispensable quality of a religious guide; and it ought to be so much a part of himself that the manifestation of it is unconscious and spontaneous. A loud, arrogant manner, a brisk, business manner, a cold, perfunctory manner, an easy, lounging, sprawling manner, a restless, embarrassed, confused manner—are all unbecoming and intolerable manners in ministers. The remedy for much clerical indecorum in the conduct of public worship is more culture, refinement and gentlemanliness, and above all the reverent and devout spirit. The movement and acts of our wardens, elders, deacons' sidesmen, and the arrangements they make and carry out, are often far from being dignified and reverent, and make for fuss and noise and distraction. It is not good to discuss and settle matters of Church business and routine at the doors or in the aisles when the congregation is gathering or the service proceeding. On special occasions I often preach in churches where the offertory, instead of being quietly and reverently placed on the Communion Table, is taken into one of the vestries by the collectors and counted before the close of the worship. These practices may appear unobjectionable or of no importance to some, but they often rob the worship of not a little of its impressiveness. What we want in the house of prayer is calm, and therefore the avoidance of disturbances, interruptions, incongruities of every kind which tend to divert the worshipper's mind from its devout intention; and the making of such arrangements about things small and great as shall secure quiet and reverent worship, and favour every feeling and thought that properly belongs to the House of God. Much can be done for quietness and reverence by door-keepers and caretakers. Concerning the tortures which ministers and congregations have to endure from unrefined, undevout, undisciplined choirs, I forbear to speak! Ideal organists, choir-masters, and singers are about as difficult to find as ideal ministers. That all things be done decently and in order is surely not too exacting a demand. In this matter of becoming Church manners, I feel we must begin with the children. It would not make church-going a penance to children were their parents and Sunday-school teachers to give them some instruction about the meaning of it all; tell them that it is becoming to say a little prayer on entering and leaving the church, that they ought to be quiet in their demeanour during worship, kneel or bow the head when prayers are being said, and that hurry and noise and talk when the Benediction is over are unseemly. More attention to quiet and devout behaviour would make the hours spent in church for young and old the most pleasant and profitable hours of the whole week.

Music in the Church.

In a worshipful church music must have an important place and be of the best possible quality—simple, as all best things are—simple, serious, devotional—an offering to God and not a performance to please or attract men. The hymns of the church should be the best of hymns—good and not bad poetry, good and not bad sentiment. Hymns unreal, exaggerated sensuous, morbid in their sentiment or language, ought to be avoided—also those written to express scholastic and sectarian interpretations of the Christian facts and truths. The hymns most suitable for common worship are those which give expression to the fundamental experiences and persuasions of the religious soul and to the largest and simplest aspects of Christian faith and life. The hymns will outlast the creeds. We can sing what we cannot say. "Is any doubtful let him sing psalms," and as the heart utters itself in aspiration and thanksgiving, doubt will give place to trust and fear to hope. The hymns go with us through life and call up hallowed memories. "How did I weep in Thy hymns and canticles, touched to the quick by the voices of Thy sweet attunéd Church"—wrote St. Augustine 1,400 years ago.

There is, of course, no necessary antagonism between choir and congregational singing, but in these days when many churches have gone music mad and congregations are more in danger of being choir-ridden than priest-ridden, everything has to be jealously guarded that has a tendency to foster the fatal notion of substitution in worship, or the notion that the people are spectators and hearers of worship—not the worshippers. We may worship by quietly and reverently listening to music as well as by singing ourselves; but too much must not be made of anthem and solo—which ought always to be selected in accordance with the powers of the singers and to help the worship and as part of the worship, and never for purposes of display. It has been my experience that the more ignorant and unskilled a choir is the more elaborate and difficult the anthems they select. Now, far better a well-sung hymn than an ill-sung anthem. Anything more unworshipful in its effect than an anthem not well and seriously sung, I do not know. It is an imposition and exaction on the part of "the performers." What are called in Scotland "services of praise" or services of sacred music are, so far as I have seen or heard anything of them, objectionable, and tend to vulgarise religion and the Church. They are for the most part simply a decorous form of Sunday amusement, differing only in degree from the week-day concert. The church is not a music-hall and must not be treated as one. It is not a place where instrumental or vocal skill or power may be exhibited to draw wandering and wondering ears. Music in the church is part of the worship of God, and the musicians as well as the ministers of the Church must remember that they are the priests of worship and ought to be men and women, therefore, of serious and devout temper and habit.

The Reading of the Scriptures.

The stated and systematic reading of the Scriptures is an important part of the public worship of the Church—though our Puritan fathers in their plain meeting houses refused for a time to tolerate it lest a spiritual order of worship should degenerate into a formal service, and a public exercise take the place of more personal methods of apprehending the will of God. There ought, I think, to be a more extended use of the Scriptures than is common in many of our churches. The Old Testament, outside the Psalms and a few chapters from Job and the prophets, is largely, I am afraid, a neglected book. At the same time let it be remembered that the Church is the place for the devotional use of Scripture, and only those passages ought to be read which will quicken and nourish worshipful feeling or give instruction in the principles of right living.

The Sermon: a Part of Worship.

Public worship in its truest sense includes the sermon, and the sermon must be made more and more a part of the worship. When it is what it ought to be it is felt to be a real and vital part of the worship—full of the spirit of the whole—prayer, praise, music, poetry, thought, all in one, burning with holy passion and touched with heavenly fire: a true sacrament, "the sacrament of the Word," as our fathers called it, a true means of grace, lifting the sensitive and sympathetic mind and heart into the presence of God. It is not always, or even often, possible to be loyal to this ideal of the sermon, partly because one man has to preach too frequently to the same congregation, and partly because we are too often compelled, for reasons I need not mention, to use the Sunday hours of worship for saying things that would be best said in the lecture hall or Bible class. It is the fate, not the fault, of the modern pulpit that it has to do so much explanatory and controversial work in order to make and keep free and clear the pure and central objects of the heart's trust and love, and that it is often forced to bid people listen to arguments, puzzle over texts, weigh perplexing evidence when, perhaps, they only want to catch a strain of the Divine harmony that pervades the universe, touch the healing hand of Christ and find rest in God.

But more fatal to the purpose of worship than the discussion of critical and theological questions is the vulgarity of sensational preaching. In the days of my boyhood in the North of Scotland I used to hear much of the pulpit dying of its dignity—but better die of dignity than of stooping to pander to vulgar tastes and cravings. Better small congregations than sacred buildings crowded with people simply seeking entertainment and the gratification of curiosity! "It is a strange mistake," said Tholuck, "to think that even common people prefer to hear from the pulpit the thought and language and style of their common hours." I hope that is true, but I often doubt it.

But in thus speaking I would not seem even to limit the range of subjects that may be treated by the pulpit. In my church in Glasgow Dr. George Macdonald visited us for several years every autumn, and lectured on week evenings on such subjects as Hamlet, King Lear, Macbeth, Dante, the poems of Wordsworth, Burns, and Tennyson, and in a way and spirit so profoundly impressive that they might have been given as sermons at the Sunday service. They brought out religious lessons such as one may easily fail to receive from half of the sermons that are preached every Sunday. We cannot judge very well the suitability of a discourse from its title or subject. The supreme and real use of the Bible in church is, I have said, the religious use, the use of its stories, biographies, poems, parables, gospels, epistles, to make men feel and think religiously, and whatever, therefore, helps men to feel and think religiously, whatever makes so audible and persuasive some message of the living God that it moves and raises men, is doing the work of the Bible. But everything depends on the man, his spirit, his wisdom, his sensitiveness to the spiritual aspects of life, his faith. This is the power of the Keys—the power of faith to quicken and increase faith in others. Say what we like about apostolical succession and sacerdotal grace, it is a wise and sound instinct which separates the Christian minister from a lecturer on theological and ethical questions, or from a talented speaker on philosophical or social or literary problems, or from an organiser and leader of oratorical and other semi-religious entertainments. The common Nonconformist protest against the priestly conception of the ministry is at heart, I believe, a Christian protest, though it is little careful to distinguish between the true and the false priesthood. There is a priesthood of spirit and character. It is true that all the Lord's people ought to be priests and prophets; but every man who seeks to lead the worship and help the faith of a Christian congregation ought to have in a larger, finer, more disciplined, more commanding measure both prophetic and priestly power—the power to speak to men for God and the power to speak to God for men, and to offer in their name the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and thanksgiving. Both kinds of power are the gifts of God; but they are not conferred in any outward way, and they cannot be preserved and increased without constant and severe personal discipline and culture. There are, doubtless, other gifts that seem for a time to attract and satisfy, such as the power of saying smart or striking things; but to serious people at least the tongues of men and of angels soon become as sounding brass if they are not the instruments of a genuine and disciplined faith; and when we go beneath the surface, we find that the truer and deeper demand of men is for churches that minister to the great spiritual necessities which know neither to-day nor yesterday, but are always the same—for worshipful churches, and for ministers whose ministry of prayer and preaching has that note of spiritual authority which is given and can only be given by experimental and practical mastery of the secrets of the life lived with Christ in God.

"My house shall be called a house of prayer," said the prophet, speaking in the name of His God; and to-day, as long ago, we go to church to pray together, to ask the Father of us all for good things for ourselves and for our brethren.

Silent Prayer.

The place of silent prayer in public worship requires, I think, in these exciting and noisy days to be more recognised and provided for. Why are we so afraid of silence? Both the translators and revisers of the Old Testament seem to have been, for where we read, "Praise waiteth for Thee, O God in Zion," the Hebrew poet exclaimed, "Unto Thee silence is worship." In the silent meeting of the Friends before God there is much to learn. How much can be said for it? Silence—a living silence—ought to be a part of our worship. It may be more helpful to be silent together than to sing together, and silence may be more prayerful than much of what is called vocal prayer. In silent, quiet waiting and communion the holiest and deepest aspirations of the soul may find expression; and the meditations of the heart as well as the words of the mouth be acceptable before God our strength and our Redeemer.

Worship—Liturgical and Free.

The experience of many years in the ministry of the Christian Church has only deepened the conviction of the need and advantage of liturgical and responsive worship. The two ways of worship—liturgical and free, have each proved their right to exist, and they may exist side by side. Opportunity ought to be given in every service for the introduction of free-prayer when the minister is moved thereto; but it is good that the larger part of the prayers should be before the eyes and in the hands of the people, that they may be able directly to participate in the worship, and that their worship may be saved from the unregulated and unchastened individualism of one man. I have sometimes heard extemporaneous prayer described by its extreme advocates in a grand philosophical way as the characteristic expression of "the genius" of the Puritan churches; but it is often, I fear, the characteristic expression of our want of genius; it is our weakness as well as our strength, aye, more our weakness than our strength. The men who are qualified to lead in this freer order of worship are very few, and even they are not always at their best. And, however, impressive and edifying, it is not often that these free outpourings of devotion meet the needs and circumstances of the people, and are an adequate medium and expression for common prayer. It is often only too manifest from the attitudes of the congregation that extemporaneous prayer is not common prayer. In hymn and psalm the people worship together, but in prayer their behaviour is more that of an audience than of a worshipping assembly. They are not praying themselves, but simply hearing prayers. It is the clear perception of this by the more thoughtful and devout which lies at the root of the widespread movement in Puritan and Presbyterian churches in favour of responsive worship. Responses which enable people to take part actively and audibly in the prayers of the church both engage the attention and assist in the cultivation of reverent habits. Many years ago the late Dr. Robert Lee, of Edinburgh, wrote that "a church which uses a liturgy will always gain among educated people upon a church which employs only extemporaneous prayer," and that the want of a liturgy would prove the overthrow of the Church of Scotland at no distant period. The counsel of the late Matthew Arnold not to develop unduly dominant characteristics is a word of wisdom not only for nations but churches. There is something vastly better than either the Puritan or Episcopalian order of worship, and that is an order which blends the truth and good of both orders. The ideal of public worship is the union in one service of free and liturgical prayer. Far distant be the day when free prayer—the voluntary and personal prayer of the minister—shall have no place in public worship; but we have had long enough experience of it now to have learned that the custom of the Jewish Church, and of the Christian Church for fifteen centuries, has also its truth and value, and whatever brings the whole congregation to worship together is in the true line of the evolution of the congregational principle.

The charge of sameness is often urged against liturgical worship, but to many thoughtful and devout people—familiarity with the words is a help and not a hindrance to fresh feeling—delivering them from that eagerly expectant as well as critical attitude in prayer which makes reverence and devout participation so difficult. The words of prayer, if they are true, simple, beautiful and expressive words, like the words of the Lord's Prayer, become with repetition more full of meaning, while memories and associations gather around them that give them an increasing charm and make their recurrence truly sacramental.

Baptism and Confirmation.

In the pubic worship of our Free Churches we need, I think, to make more of the two sacraments of our religion—Baptism and the Lord's Supper, which give expression to those thoughts and feelings by which a Christian Church is differentiated from every other kind of association. One has heard and read pleas for the sacraments which can only be characterised as subtle apologies for magic and incantation; but the belief that the grace and spirit of God may enter the heart and life through unconscious as well as conscious channels is not without its reasonable basis. We are indeed poor believers, if we do not believe more than we can see, more than we can define, and more than we can defend with the weapons of our logic. Regeneration may not take place in baptism, but baptism is a witness to the fact that every child born into the world is a child of God and is capable of regeneration, and is baptised in order to be nurtured and trained for it. It is the recognition in every child of a Divine nature, begotten, not made—waiting for the new birth that is to be. It says to the parent, Your child comes into the world not as a mere animal comes, but with something of God in it which you must watch over and cherish and train.

The baptismal service is the consecration and dedication of childhood, and it is one of the most meaningful and beautiful services which can be held in the church. It may, like the Communion, when necessity calls for it, be observed in private, but it is essentially a church ordinance and loses in significance and impressiveness when not observed in the church. It becomes still more expressive when it is followed up by its needful complement in a service of dedication in later years, corresponding to the rite of confirmation in the Lutheran and Episcopal churches. We need some such established way of drawing into direct and open church relations the baptised children of the Church. In the days of opening manhood and womanhood such a public stand for all that was implied in their baptism, such a recognition of their Divine and eternal relations, is of the greatest benefit to the young. No superstition need be connected with it. In its essence it is only a promise made, a blessing invoked and a welcome given.

The Lord's Supper.

In the Christian Church, the Supper of the Lord has always been regarded as a solemn and central act of Christian worship. It speaks of facts and truths which lie outside the field of controversy to all disciples of Christ; and we wrong it when we identify it with this or that set of theological opinions. It is a poetic symbol—not a creed.

Much of the poverty and coldness of the spiritual life in our churches may be traced, I think, to the way in which we treat the Communion of the Lord's Supper, and the meditations and prayers which lead up to it. We need to make more not less of this sacrament—eloquent to the eye and heart as no other service can be. Is it not a part of that organisation by which the faith and spirit of the Son of God are to be kept alive in the world and transmitted from generation to generation? Approached in a serious and humble spirit, it will be to us what it has been to a multitude of devout souls which no man can number; the Holy Commemoration, a quickening and inspiring remembrance of the Saviour's Holy Living and Dying; the Holy Eucharist, a service of thanksgiving for all the blessings which have come to us and our race through Jesus Christ our Lord; the Holy Communion, the sign of our communion with God our Father and Jesus Christ His Son, and a help to its realisation, the sign of our communion with all disciples of Christ, with the Church of all ages and lands, and with the Church triumphant, especially with our own dear and holy dead in a Love from which neither life nor death, things present nor things to come, can separate us.

Times and Seasons.

The seasons and times of worship demand special attention and not a brief and passing notice at the close of an already too long address. The Sunday as the day of religious meditation and worship was always needed, but it is needed now more than in any past days. It seems set over against the characteristic temptations of our times. More than our fathers do we need it; need it as a means of escape from the dominant materialism and secularism of our generation, and that we may find and preserve the ideal unity of the two lives and the two worlds.

Not long before his death Mr. Gladstone published an article on this question, in which he avowed his entire want of sympathy with those who think the demand of duty is satisfied by the resort to a single service on the Sunday. He argued, and rightly argued, that the people who argue for a maximum of indulgence and a maximum of concession in this matter have a mode of regarding Sunday, and the Church and its worship, which is alien to the truly religious spirit. Hardly anyone now wants to make the Sunday a day of gloom to young or old; but we must do all we can to preserve it, and to make it more than ever, the day of religion, the day of meditation and worship—that its wise observance may help us to consecrate to truth and goodness—to God—all the other days of the week.

But I never like to take it for granted that Sunday is the only day when church doors are open for the worship of God. I have advocated for many years the opening of at least one church in every neighbourhood for daily worship, and for two or three years made the experiment—which was only given up for want of sufficient assistance. Private prayer and family prayer ought not to be neglected, but they cannot be a substitute for the worship of the Church and its witness to the invisible and eternal realities of life. In the midst of the care and strife of our days we need quiet resting-places and quiet moments of thought and prayer. Instead of letting these costly and spacious ecclesiastical structures stand in stately idleness from Sunday to Sunday, let us open their doors daily, if not for prayer and preaching, at least as a refuge from the noise and hurry of the streets where tired souls may find rest and peace.

The Christian Year.

In our order of Free Church life and worship, let us turn to best account the sympathy for times and seasons which appeal to imagination and memory with such sweet and solemn power. It is not our duty as liberal Christians to abolish observances and forms, but to fill them and keep them full with reality. Let us accept the Christian Year, and breathe into it, if possible, a truer and larger thought and a finer spirit. Our weakness needs such a help, and our strength cannot dispense with it. It was necessary, no doubt, in past days to protest against ecclesiastical tyranny and the superstition which had gathered around many ancient and beautiful customs, but now that we are delivered from all dominion over our faith, and are more in danger from worldliness than from error or superstition, why should we not freely and from our own sense of need resume all that we honestly can of this sacred order? We can take away from it and add to it, but why should we entirely neglect it? The Christian Year belongs to the whole of Christendom, and we have the freedom of Christendom. It has not only its picturesque and sentimental use and value, but it gives us a practical teaching that circles around the radiating centre of our religion, around Jesus Christ and all that he has been and is, and is to be to man's faith and hope and love, to man's sin and sorrow and fear, to man's mind and imagination and whole life. It makes of him a great Companion and brings him near to us in real and helpful ways in many incidents and passages of our daily life and experience. It also emphasises what many among us are often tempted to forget, the need there is for the systematic discipline and culture of the devout life, to win and keep what our Benediction calls "the communion of the Holy Spirit," and that we may walk among men as those who walk with God.

The practical value to men and to communities of men of a Church truly worshipful in all its ways is, I believe, simply incalculable. It is more necessary to them than food and shelter, science and machinery, music and literature; more to be "fellow citizens with the saints and of the household of God" than to be citizens of England. May the congregations of Christ's flock, which are represented in this Conference to-day, help to fulfil the old prophecy, "And they that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places, thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations, and thou shalt be called the repairer of the breach and the restorer of paths to dwell in."

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

On Thursday the morning's devotional service was conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, after which the chair was taken by Mr. WILLIAM LONG, J.P.; and the Rev. Joseph Wood read a paper on "Church Needs and Conference Ideals."

CHURCH NEEDS AND CONFERENCE IDEALS.

BY THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD.

DURING the twenty-one years I have known our churches I have attended at least one meeting each year of ministers and others called to discuss our condition. Like the poor, the condition of our churches is a subject always with us. I have heard many Jeremiads on the one hand, and no little self-complacency on the other. But I must candidly confess that the question has never received much illumination either from the contributions of others or my own. No one who is intimate with the life of our churches can view their present or their future with anything but grave concern. The part of Cassandra is the very last I should desire to play; yet one who is an incorrigible optimist, both by temperament and conviction, may feel bound to point out that all is not well with us, that the springs often runs dry, that the fires on the altar are often dim and ashy. Diminishing congregations, scanty attendance at public worship on the part of those who remain, the dry rot of indifference, increasing financial difficulties, balance-sheets, that only balance by dramatic performances, church dances, ping-pong tournaments, and the like, the leakage of the young people of our old families—these things meet us at every turn. It is true these weaknesses are not peculiar to ourselves; they afflict the great orthodox churches also, a very sure indication of which may be seen in the church census that is made to-day when compared with any previous numbering of the people. Numbers are not everything, finance is no infallible test of church life, public worship is not religion, church socials are not the unpardonable sin, and truth is always in a minority! We seek comfort in such reflections, but "common is the commonplace, and vacant chaff well meant for grain." Neither do I find anything exhilarating in the frequent remark with which we salve our souls, that while our churches do not advance the great cause goes on, and our influence is felt by all churches in the remodelling of their creeds, slowly but surely changing their attitude, mitigating the harshness of their theology, liberalising their thought, so that something of their brighter faith and the success of its appeal is due to us. I thank God that other churches receive a blessing from us, but I want our own churches to be blessed also. It is good to know that our influence reaches far and wide, but I should like more of it concentrated on our own home. I am not content to see the Cause flourish outside the walls of our own household of faith while it languishes within. To every sign of vitality in sister churches I say, "All Hail!" But I desire to see some grapes in our own vineyard and some figs on our own trees. It may be the will of the Lord that our churches shall best further the coming day of that broader faith and nobler creed for which they exist by their slow martyrdom. If so, I will gladly acquiesce. But at the present moment I am not at all convinced that this is our God-ordained destiny. On the contrary, my conviction grows every day that the gates of a glorious opportunity are open before us, and that "to the words hope, light, persistence" a radiant future beckons us on. Never before in the history of our churches had they so golden a chance, so promising a field, so commanding a call as to-day. The only question is, have we faith, courage, enterprise?—faith in God, our cause and ourselves; courage to face the new condition of the new time, though it means discarding, it may be, cherished methods and traditions. Have we enterprise enough to adapt our churches to the needs and life of the world of to-day?

We must wake up.

A Royal prince has lately told England she must wake up. I am quite sure our churches need waking up. Too many of them are content to go jogging on in the old ruts. The most radical of all churches in our thought, we are the most conservative in our methods. We threaten to die of respectable routine. The machinery of our churches is hopelessly out of date. Too many of us are living in a fool's paradise. Because we can get up a big gathering once in three years, where we shout till all is blue; because we can raise considerable sums of money when an accomplished and a "deny-me-at-your-peril" mendicant, like our President, stumps the country for a whole year; because we distribute a million leaflets and sell ten thousand books, we are apt to think that our Zion can hardly be bettered. Alas! when we go back to our churches and meet barely a score of faces at the morning service, when we see the shifts treasurers are put to in squaring their accounts, when we mark the disappearance of old supporters whose places are not taken by new, when in lonely places we must fight alone, and friends are few and days are dark, and the work is never brightened by one gleam of success, and our ministers suffer distressing privations, and spring and spontaneity are impossible—then we begin to doubt, not our message—never—but our methods. It is a blessed thing to be permitted to spread the light and to declare such a faith as ours. I yield to no man in witnessing to the high-heartedness which our gospel demands and inspires. But there is slag in everything. This is a world of slag. Slag came in when Adam went out of Paradise; and it is here still. So there come into our work things that tend to kill out enthusiasm, and to quench the fires of ardour and expectation kindled at meetings like these. Let no one say I am a croaker. Better men than I have put it on record that things are not well with us. When Dr. Martineau was preparing his organisation scheme for the Leeds Conference he wrote to Mr. Thom:—"The task, I fear, requires more faith in our religious future than I can honestly profess to feel. The doubt will force itself upon me whether we are worth organising." Dr. Watson, in his charming review of Martineau's biography, gently reminds us, but in a way which scarcely conceals his own opinion, "there are those who prophesy that within a reasonable time the Unitarian denomination will cease to exist." Now, while I am not so sadly despondent about our future as Dr. Martineau, nor so smilingly acquiescent in our extinction as Dr. Watson, I am sure we gain nothing by not facing the facts. Perhaps it is easier to do that than to account for them. We have all puzzled our brains with the question: "Why, why do we not succeed?" Dr. Watson credits us with conspicuous moral integrity and love of truth—surely two priceless possessions. We have also some other gifts and graces of which we need not be ashamed, although I decline to say just what they are. We have this, and that, and the other, and yet

Wanting—is what?
Summer redundant,
Blossoms abundant,
—Where is the blot?

And when we go on to cry:

Come thou—O Comer!
Pant through the blueness, perfect the summer, we are not quite sure what kind of a "comer" we want.

More Life, of Course!

The ordinary answer is the well-known line from Tennyson, "'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant, More life and fuller that we want." Which is perfectly true, but then it is always and anywhere true; there has been no time in the history of any church when this was not its great want; there is no church to-day that does not mourn for lack of life, that does not pray to be made more and more largely alive. And for our encouragement I will say our very discontent is a sign of life. It is the life within that is discontented, the life that is not enough and is calling for more. A dead church does not cry out for fuller life any more than a corpse. More life is the conscious or unconscious prayer of all religious societies. But it does not seem to me that this hits our special want. It is a want we share with others, but it is unfortunately vague, and fails to indicate our own special weakness and complaint.

What then is it our churches mostly need, when, leaving the universally felt want of life, we descend to detail?

More Interest in Public Worship.

1. The first of our church needs is a revived interest in public worship. None of our social, educational, and philanthropic agencies can take the place of this. We may display a thousand activities, we may open our schoolrooms every night in the week, we may have an overflowing exchequer, but without worship we shall hear little but the clang and clank of machinery. The services of the church are the beating heart of all her life. I view with infinite regret and alarm the widespread neglect among our own members of public worship. It is a paralysing malady, the beginning of congregational decay. The Sunday services of prayer and praise are the central force of a living church. If they are cold and dull and badly attended everything begins to wear a sickly hue. We have beautiful, stately prayers in our services, but they too often lack the wings of a worshipping congregation. We have culture and earnestness in the pulpit, rendered terribly ineffective by a beggarly array of empty benches. No man can wax eloquent in a quarter-filled church. Our non-church-going and our Sunday laxities to-day are quite as hurtful as the old Puritan strictness and severity. We have secularised Sundays without hallowing Monday. On the plea that all days are sacred, we have dragged down the Lord's Day to the level of the world's days, without making all days the Lord's. Rejoicing in the faith that life and work are prayer, we have forsaken appointed times and offices of prayer without making a liturgy of life and labour. There is a false liberalism in vogue among us. The mitigation of the old scrupulous Sabbatical proprieties has made Sunday for many a thousand-fold more joyful than before. There are larger and freer notions to-day of how Sunday should be used. But the freer use of Sunday is beautiful only as it means its truer keeping, not as it means its throwing away. We have asked for a Sunday of larger liberty and less constrained observance in the interests of an elevated and not of a degraded spirituality. I do not believe in the possibility of making all the week a Sunday unless we make Sunday something special on its religious side. Do you think the world can do without reverence—yet reverence is not growing stronger in the heart of the nation. Why? Largely because we are neglecting its culture by worship. Now, while I believe in brightening our services, and in the place and influence of architecture, music, and beautiful symbolism in the church, these things alone will not restore the spirit of reverence. We must get below the trivialities and flippancies of our modern life, below its conventions and standards, and touch the soul until deep calls unto deep. Brethren, we need to preach more earnestly the soul's need of God, to quicken a true sense of humility and transcendent wonder, and to make men feel, not the irksome duty, but the glad privilege of lifting the heart in joyful unison with comrades in the place where prayer is wont to be made. Let us be sure that the larger liberty we allow our children does not interfere with that habit of church-going, which is one of the most invaluable habits childhood acquires.

I suggest that the Conference should issue a pastoral to the churches, published in a form to reach every member on our rolls, calling serious attention to the importance of public worship, to the danger arising from its neglect, to the value of creating the habit of attendance on the part of children, to the loss of spiritual faculty that must accrue by the materialisation of Sunday, and to the opportunity the worship of the church gives for public and much-needed witness-bearing.

Fellowship in the Church.

2. We need a clearer conception of the Church Idea. In our rebound from sacerdotal pretensions, from church authority, from the idea of merit attending our prayers, and from the claim that the offices of the church are the necessary channels of Divine grace, we have gone to the other extreme, and have too often come to regard what should be the worshipping congregation as an audience, and the church as a kind of lecture institution, the members of which are just a fortuitous concourse of atoms, with no more cohesion than an audience at a concert. That church members have a duty towards each other, that the ties which unite them are far more intimate than those which bring men together in clubs, art societies, hospital committees, municipal work, or political union, that the church is a channel of grace, a divine institution for realising the purposes of God and the better hopes of the heart, is a view which sorely needs emphasising among us. I was once asked, "Why should I be friendly with a man just because of the accident that he and I attend the same church?" You might as well ask, "Why should I be specially interested in a man because of the accident that he and I happen to have the same parents?" Men do not come together in churches by accident. Certain spiritual affinities are at work, invisible ties of comradeship are present, and we are there because in that plane of feeling and devotion we breathe a life-giving atmosphere. To that atmosphere every member contributes something of value. In the church we realise as nowhere else, except in the family, what brotherhood means. Because we are bound together in the same church, running our course of life parallel to others, with links of affiliation in deep heart experiences, we have claims on each other stronger than the ordinary friendships that grow up in society. In churches contiguous drops of water seek each other and strive to make one flood. All men are my brethren, but I shall never realise that universal relationship unless I make much of those who are specially my brethren in the home and the church. The Christian Church, in its office of most pregnant symbolism, speaks of "Holy Communion." "But that," says one, "is communion with the Divine." Yes, communion of the Divine in me with the Divine in you. The world is full of fraternities, cliques, parties, guilds, confederations, unions, all founded in human nature's need of association. But in nothing does man need his brother so much as in worship. In religion sheer individualism breaks down. The church is the sacrament of fellowship—it is the crown of all fraternisation, it is the divine crystallisation of the units into a whole. Brotherhood is learned not in vague cosmopolitan generalities, and mankind is loved not by feeling towards everybody alike, but by the special relationships we find in the home, in the church, and in the neighbourhood. There is a spurious universalism and a spurious spirituality abroad which, because it hears the call to worship in spirit, thinks it can dispense with the aids to be found in times, forms, places, and the association of brethren; which because it learns that all men are its brothers, makes light of the special forms of brotherhood to be found in family and church life, and thinks that to be broad, cosmopolitan and universal it must have no particular preferences.

The broadening of sympathy does not mean that the special and particular affections are to disappear. It is true that the love which enlarges not its borders will contract, shrivel and die. But it will enlarge its borders just as it deepens its centre. Where the home and the church are slighted brotherhood has but a narrow range. In the church we realise a fellowship which is indeed wider than any church, save that of humanity, but which finds there its centre and beating heart. The throbbing of a world-wide brotherhood is nowhere so powerfully felt as in the little community drawn together by the deepest needs and holiest aspirations of the human soul. The voice, forms and services of the church are the human race in its profoundest self-consciousness witnessing to the fellowship of man with man because of the fellowship of man with God.

The Church a Channel of Divine Grace.

Moreover, we miss the mark unless we recognise that the church is indeed a channel of Divine grace the world cannot do without. It is not the only channel, it is not always the deepest and fullest channel, for there is a church outside the church, the church of the unattached, the church of men like Robert Louis Stevenson, through which streams of blessing flow to fertilise many lands. Nevertheless, the church as we know it, is one of God's chiefest ways for assimilating earth to heaven, and for ensuring from age to age the perpetual and enkindling declaration that man liveth not by bread alone. She thrusts her Sundays in among the rushing other days to make a space of peace in which the tumult of getting and spending is hushed, and the faculties reach out beyond these small and noisy visibles to the unseen and the eternal. The melody of her bells floats over the tired world. The uplift of her prayers, the play in her midst of sanctified human sympathies, charging the very air of the temple with a magnetism which ofttimes even the dullest must feel, her ingathering of children, her memories and associations, her manifold distinct utterances of God, eternity, sin, duty, righteousness, peace, by these and their like the church makes and keeps open channels for the inflow into life of the Divine.

Truer Union and Co-operation.

3. We need a better organisation of our forces. Now, I know the word "organisation" is to some of our friends the symbol of tyranny, priestcraft, ecclesiastical authority, and forty other terrible things. Only whisper it and they are all in a twitter of fear and suspicion; something deadly is in the air; it keeps them lying awake o' nights; it threatens to deluge the planet; above all, it endangers the precious liberty of every man doing as he pleases, and of every church going to decay as it chooses, and of every preacher preaching just what he wants to! It is the one respectable bogey we have left—organisation. But let us not be affrighted by names. What a wonderful triumph of organisation is the human hand—nerves, veins, muscles, ligaments, joints, bones, flesh, and skin—so tempered and co-operative that man has in his hand the finest tool in the universe. What a magnificent result of organisation is human society, all its millionfold nerves, parts, interests, on-goings, labours, songs, throes, agonies, tears, strivings, birth-pangs, all its traffic and merchandise, its contrivances whereby great cities are fed, its social claims, its clashing moral rights, the thunder of its battles, the tramp of its workmen, the clang of its hammers, its instruments of music, its courts of justice, its powerful inventions, its steady gain from age to age, all combining to make up that entity we call "Civilisation." "Oh," you say, "in these things, of course, we accept organisation." Which reminds me of Carlyle's exclamation when he was told that Mrs. Somerville had said, "She accepted the universe!" "Gad! She'd better!" replied the sage. On the whole, I think we had better accept organisation.

But suppose we drop the offensive word and talk about union, federation, cohesion, and co-operation. Are we quite so sure as we used to be that freedom can only go along with a sheer, stark, extreme individualism? that we can only keep clear from the taint of ecclesiastical authority in isolation? that the Congregational principle does not need some slight modification in order that our churches may adapt themselves to the new conditions of our life to-day? Look only at one of the great changes in the life of England during the last seventy years and ask whether the pure Congregationalism which sufficed in the past is sufficient in these widely different times. The great exodus from the country to the towns, which all social reformers deplore, has affected our churches most disastrously, and made it almost impossible for them to exist on simple Congregational lines. They are not, cannot be, sufficient to themselves. Once independent, they now largely live in dependence on others. To-day they need a backing and a support from without, which was not necessary when the population about them swarmed with resources and activity. We all recognise this new condition, and try to meet it in a halting way—anxiously bolstering up the idea that each church must, at any rate, keep up the appearance of a self-contained and self-sufficing whole. In all such cases the purely Congregational principle has broken down. But we are very reluctant to face the new order of things, which means the obligation of the strong to care for the weak. What responsibility does Yorkshire feel for Devonshire, or Liverpool for Suffolk?

A Church, not Separate Churches.

Now, I take it that the root weakness lies in the fact that we are "churches" only, and not a church—that we are fragments and not a totality, the result of which is denominational anarchy. We have no centre, unless it be Carlyle's "Centre of Indifference." The parts do not make a whole. It is as if the members of a body were lying on the ground, all disjointed, with no connecting ligaments, and no fair covering of rose-coloured flesh, binding them into one. And in such a condition the eye does sometimes say to the hand, "I have no need of thee." Is it possible that these fragments shall become a whole—a living body—throwing itself with the weight and momentum of a single solid mass into the cause we have at heart? At these triennial gatherings we know the joy of united worship; but do we not deny ourselves too much the joy of united well-doing? Can we not gather into one our scattered congregations, and so check the waste and gain the power which comes of concentration? Think of the loneliness of many of our brethren, the struggle to keep afloat, the insecurity of income, the hopelessness of making any headway, grimly plodding on, not indeed without sympathy and help, but with sympathy and help which are quite inadequate to the necessities of the case. Surely we need to combine the energies of our churches, to create a living cohesion of forces, to be baptised into one heart, one spirit, one hope, pledged in all to loyal companionship, bound into the powerful unity of one organic frame, a society, a church, whose very breath and life and being shall be instinct with the joy of a common life and the power of a real fellowship.

This does not mean that we must be more sectarian than of old, or more exclusive, or that we are to be less free to think and advance, to sail to all points of the compass and to land on all distant shores. Still less does it mean the imposition of tests or the assumption of authority. It means the brotherhood of churches realised, brotherhood not afraid to be brotherhood by some bugbear of ecclesiasticism to which it might lead as a remote contingency. I suppose it might, and I suppose the earth might rush out of its orbit to give Mars a sounding thwack; and I think one about as likely as the other. So long as our churches are made up of truth-loving and freedom-loyal men no organisation can possibly endanger our liberties.

It is the mission of the Conference to bring about a more vital cohesion, and a larger, more intimate co-operation of our churches; to be their rallying point, their organ, their centre of attraction, so that when it speaks and acts it shall be with the voice and hands of a single body. The Conference stands for a united church. The Conference is not a society of private individuals; the churches are its constituents, and it is for them to make it more effective that their own effectiveness may be increased.

Leave the Name alone!

"But," says someone, with a view of reducing me to my ultimate atoms, "a united church must have a name, and the name is a rock on which you will split"; while another exclaims: "There is only one possible name." Well, I admit that the name is a forty-ton explosive question. For my part, I am a thousand times more concerned about the thing. Let us get that, and the name will settle itself. As for the name "Unitarian," I love it and I detest it. At present it causes more divisions among us than almost anything else. Let us resolutely push aside the name controversy, of which many of us are sick and ashamed. Let us for twenty years proclaim a truce of God on this dispute. Let the question be forbidden among us for that time; let us agree that anyone raising it, on this side or that, be sentenced to a fine of £10 and be kept in close confinement until he can give a lucid account of the Athanasian Creed. In the name of God, let us have a truce to the name-quarrel. To use Dr. Martineau's simile, "We have marched into this hall to-day under six different banners," and we should be no more united if, burning five, we marched out under one. Cohesion is not in names or banners.

Attend to the Status of the Ministry.

4. The first step towards a united church is concerned with the pulpit, the status, recognition, settlement and maintenance of our ministry. There are those who tell us that all our plans, subscriptions, improved methods, closer union, are nothing unless we can improve our pulpits. Our greatest church need, they say, is better preaching, more human, more spiritual, more convincing, more in touch with common life. I do not disagree, only I am convinced you are not going to get it without taking the training, status and maintenance of the ministry into account. And circumstances have so changed that a great deal of that depends no longer on congregational but on collective effort. It is true that no machinery, no status, no certainty of income will ensure for our churches a race of prophets. But churches may do excellent work without having prophets in their pulpits. A prophet is a rara avis; a church is lucky that finds one in a century, and many a minister may render most Christlike service which God will abundantly own who has not much of the prophet about him. It is impossible to make arrangements for prophets any more than for earthquakes! Whenever they appear they go their own way, heedless of all our little contrivances. The ordinary minister is neither an Elijah nor an Ezekiel. I have known an occasional Jeremiah, but I have noticed that he is a prophet the churches unanimously declare is really too good for this sinful world. Of the Twelve Apostles it does not appear that more than three or four had prophetic gifts; the others quietly laboured on in much obscurity, unknown, unnoticed, sowing the seed, spreading the light according to their powers, content that their work should be unrecorded of men if it might live on in the great whole. It is for the ordinary apostle, the average minister, we are called to make arrangements, for the men whose labours are the spade-work of our churches, and who come under a category to which most of us belong. We need not be afraid to face the truth. All ministers are not endowed with great intellectual powers; the education of some has been very imperfect; the gift of eloquence is not possessed by all. You have no business to expect that all your ministers will be Channings, Beards, and Armstrongs. All members of the medical profession are not characterised by special ability—all who paint are not great artists—there are feeble although useful members of the great guild of Literature; and not every lawyer is fit for the Woolsack. Yet all these average people have their place, and by their labours more than even by the genius of the few the fabric of the world is maintained. I have a great affection for the ordinary minister—is he not bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh? The faithful, average minister, confined to a humble sphere, keeping his little corner of the world warm and glowing by the fire of his own love, is the man whose efforts lay the foundation of that united church we picture. Now, something can be done to improve him, and I aver that the ordinary pulpit may be made much more effective by wise methods, by arrangements to relieve it somewhat from the pressure of pecuniary care, by the backing it may receive from the church as a whole, by bringing its occupant out of his isolation into felt and conscious union.

Minister and Church Executive.

Let us come to details. (A) I have not much to say as to status, except to endorse the remarks of one of my most thoughtful and most widely-respected correspondents, who writes:—

> The improvement of ministerial status will be brought about, not so much by securing in all cases a certain minimum stipend, as by amending the constitution of our churches. Our ministers lack status because everything connected with their work is precarious and undefined. In many instances we are not even members of our own Church Councils, and have no power over our own pulpits. Government by committee may seem to satisfy democratic requirements, but petty control in small matters does a great deal to check the spirit and zeal of men who, in proportion to their ability, feel that to do their work well, they must do it in their own way. Status goes with power to act, not with pay, and that is why men of means and position, with good degrees, will act as curates and curates in charge of missions, who would not be attracted by increased stipend at the cost of reduced liberty. I used to wonder why men with private income did not volunteer for ministry in some of our poorer churches, but I do not wonder now.

My correspondent expresses a view which is deeply felt by many of our ministers. With greater freedom of speech in the pulpit than any church in Christendom, our ministers have less freedom of action outside the pulpit. That jealous exclusion from the Church Council is quite peculiar to ourselves; no other church keeps its ministers outside the Council doors. Things are constantly done in which he has no voice and about which he is never consulted. In cases where the church is governed by trustees this sometimes reaches a point which is almost intolerable. I have known the trustees of one of our chapels close its Sunday-school without the minister knowing a word of it until it was done. There are several cases in which the trustees decline to let the minister know the state of their funds, and instances have come before me of the publication of church reports which the minister has never seen. So there comes about that mischievous division of interests which I am convinced is one source of weakness among us—whereby the minister has nothing to do with the business side of the church, and the committee has nothing to do with its spiritual side. Now there is nothing connected with a church, not even its lighting and ventilation, which is not the minister's business, and there is nothing connected with its religious life which is not the committee's business, and not until this artificial distinction between the spiritual and the secular disappears—a distinction which exists in no other church in Christendom, whether Hierarchical, Presbyterian, Wesleyan, Nonconformist, or Lutheran—shall we remove the reproach that our ministry is a difficult position for self-respecting men.

A Committee of Settlement.

(B) Settlement. The settlement and the removal of our ministers is always a difficult and often a painful problem. Sometimes it happens that the round man finds himself in a square hole; or a man becomes conscious that in this particular corner of the vineyard his work is done, his influence at an end, and it comes home to him that he would serve his church better by retiring than by staying on; or causes of difference have arisen—some want of tact or judgment which makes it desirable he should give way to another; there are, in fact, many reasons why men feel it would be good for them and good for the church that a change should take place. Yet how difficult, and often how humiliating, is the process! An interregnum cannot be afforded. The minister has a wife and children, and of necessity he must stay where he is until called elsewhere. How anxious the time, how painful the experience! If he has an influential brother-minister for a friend, he gets him to write to a vacant church, or he writes himself offering his services like a clerk seeking a situation; or he ear-wigs some much perplexed, much entreated secretary, or, lowest deep of all, he advertises. Churches, too, are not seldom in the same predicament, they do not know where to turn or whom to consult to secure the kind of minister they want, and they advertise for applications—a miserable device which brings them all the undesirables in the market. We need a trustworthy committee, which, without authority, shall act as a means of communication between ministers and churches, to which both ministers and churches might turn for advice and help. Such a committee, wisely constituted, might prevent many of the mistakes now made, and provide an honourable instead of a humiliating way out of many a delicate position. It is for the Conference, in the name and interests of the churches, to set up such an advisory and settlements committee, to which might also be referred, with advantage, the duties now discharged by various advisory boards as to the recognition of ministers arriving from other communions.

Ministerial Maintenance.

(C) Let us turn to a larger and yet more difficult subject—the maintenance of the ministry. At our first Conference, held in Liverpool twenty-one years ago, a paper was read on "Ministers' Stipends and Augmentation Funds" by our dear and honoured friend Mr. Rawson. That paper brought to light a number of startling facts with regard to the impecuniosity of many of our ministers and the beggarly stipends on which they had to exist—heaven knows how! The result was a great moving of hearts and the immediate establishment of a Sustentation Fund, subscribed by our people generally. This fund has proved an incalculable blessing in many a minister's home, administered as it is with wisdom, sympathy, and open-handedness. But it has been sadly borne in upon me by incontestable evidence that to-day we are no better off than we were twenty-one years ago, for while the Sustentation Fund is to the good, the contributions of the local churches have diminished, so that the average annual stipend remains much as it was. Following Mr. Rawson's lead, I sent to every minister in charge of a congregation in England and Wales a circular asking for information as to the total ministerial income and the sources from whence derived. I have not, indeed, covered so wide an area as Mr. Rawson, who included Scotland and Ireland in his inquiries. I have confined my attention to England and Wales, as it seems to me that Scotland and Ireland have their own special needs and their own special funds, and must, at any rate at this stage, be considered separately. The number of circulars sent out was 250, of which number 240 were returned filled in, and I have obtained information with regard to four others. My figures and averages therefore are based upon the stipends paid in 244 churches, including in this category missionaries and missionary agents. In the first place, for the sake of comparison with the condition of things twenty-one years ago, I will take exactly the same course as Mr. Rawson. At that time the Sustentation Fund was not in existence, and Mr. Rawson excluded the Augmentation Fund from his returns. My first batch of figures will also exclude these two funds.

The total income on this basis of the 244 ministers is £45,097, or an average of £184 16s. Mr. Rawson's returns, including Scotland and Ireland, numbered 253, and the total income was £46,543, with an average of £184. So far, then, there seems to be an increase of 16s. per head during the twenty-one years. But this is quite fallacious, for if Scotland and Ireland had been included the average would have been appreciably lowered, as the stipends in these countries rule a good deal beneath those in England. Further, the total to-day includes Missionary Agents, who were not in existence at the first conference. But without making any further deductions we see that the churches themselves are actually raising less to-day for ministerial stipends than they were twenty-one years ago. If, however, we go on beyond Mr. Rawson's figures, and include the total income of the Augmentation Fund and the grants of the Sustentation Fund, the average will be brought up to £199, which, if not satisfactory, is not so alarming as might have been feared. Yet when we analyse these figures a little further some startling results appear. Taking the returns exactly as they were sent in, including grants from all sources, they show that there are

47	,,	of £100	,,	£150	,,	56	,,

5	,,	£400	,,	£500	,,	6	,,
9	,,	£500 and upwards			,,	13	,,

This, again, on the surface does not seem very discouraging, for while the larger stipends have diminished in number and amount the smaller ones have improved, and there has been a considerable increase in the medium stipends. On the other hand, this table includes the Sustentation grants which Mr. Rawson's table could not include, while it excludes the lowering element of Scotland and Ireland.

Only a Third of the Churches Self-Supporting.

Next let us ask, How are these stipends made up? At once we are met with the staggering fact that two-thirds of our churches receive assistance from outside sources. Only one-third of our churches are self-supporting. The total received by 244 ministers from all sources, including Augmentation and Sustentation Funds, is £48,547, of which the living congregations raise by pew rents, subscriptions, collections, sales of work, and other devices £24,104—in round numbers just one-half. Endowments account for £11,310, while grants from various funds, half-a-dozen in number; grants from the British and Foreign and Local Associations, with contributions from other outside sources, supply the balance of £12,909. The figures will be seen more clearly in tabulated form:—

I know not how it may strike others, but for myself I am appalled to know that only one-third of our churches are self-supporting, and that the ministers of two-thirds are compelled to seek aid from other quarters than their own congregations. Not less startling is it to find that the living congregations—apart from endowments—only supply one-half of the total ministerial income. These two facts need no comment except that of anxious reflection. They reveal a condition of things which no one can regard as healthy—a condition of things, morever, which does not at all square with pure and simple Congregationalism.

Endowments and Subscriptions.

There has been in the last twenty-one years a considerable addition to church endowments, without, as you see, in any way adding to the average of ministerial stipends. In 1882 Mr. Rawson spoke strongly on the blighting effect of endowments. I think he would speak still more strongly to-day. In ten cases which have come under my notice, the increased endowments amount to nearly £20,000. But the ministers of those churches are not one penny the better, and in two instances their incomes have diminished. The endowments of the dead have stopped the flow of contributions from the living, and I think some of our pious ancestors would turn in their graves if they knew that their legacies had only relieved other people from their subscriptions. There are nineteen churches which do not contribute one farthing to their ministers' stipends, the whole being found by endowments. There is one amusing case of a stipend from endowment of £225 which the congregation make up to £230. I hear men say, "If it were not for their endowments many of our places could not live." I beg leave to doubt it. I am rather inclined to think it is their endowments which have killed them. Energy, enterprise, resourcefulness, initiative, and generosity have all been atrophied by the knowledge that the place could carry on under any circumstances. There are painful matters connected with some of these endowments on which something might be said if there were time. I will only add here that trustees who do not present a yearly balance-sheet of their funds to the congregation are guilty of a grave dereliction of public duty.

Incomes of less than £150.

Let us return for a minute or two to the incomes under £150 a year. It is not creditable to us that there should be sixty-nine of our ministers living on this starvation wage. I suppose that most of us when we entered upon the ministry expected to be poor, were willing to be poor—and we have not been disappointed! But we hardly thought we should be indecently poor, glad of parcels of cast-off clothing for our wives and children! Certainly no one can ever make money, or ought to make money, in the ministry. To begin with, all our young men see the Divine beauty of that early but never obsolete Scripture: "It is not good for man to be alone," and proceed to verify it as soon as possible. I have sometimes thought it would be a good thing to have a celibate class in the ranks of our ministry, with a view to service in poor places—temporary celibates say for ten years; but having married early myself I do not feel I am the right man to advocate that self-denying ordinance. So ministers cannot make money. Their wives and children and other sad necessities will keep them right up to the limit of their income. Then the very calling in which we are engaged forbids parsimoniousness, and the half-crown which might have gone into the P.O. Savings Bank has got itself transferred into jelly and oranges for a sick girl dying of consumption. No, you cannot make money in the ministry. I have no doubt that in the long run it is better so. It is well that the worldly prizes of our business should not be remarkably glittering. If they were we might have a glut of self-seeking men entering our doors. We have no deaneries and canonries to tempt anybody; we have no pulpits of £1,000 and £1,200 a year like the great Nonconformist churches. We are a poor community. But there are worse ills than poverty. I am astonished at the cheerfulness with which men write of their struggles. I have letters sent with these returns which would make you both cry and laugh at the mingled pathos and humour of their writers' stresses and distresses. In some of the poorest among us there is a strong spirit of life and gladness. One brother who has never had more than £30 a year—a brother highly esteemed by all who know him—a fully accredited minister, mind you—writes: "It is thirty years since I left orthodoxy definitely and started these services. Humanly speaking, I have been single-handed all that time; but, though it has been a task I could not have commenced had I foreseen its uphill character, yet it has been a perpetual joy to me. My intention is to keep on as long as I can—whether it adds to my small income or no. . . . Of course, if I could have more help I should be grateful: though I hope you will not think I am at all dissatisfied."—(O brave brother!)—"It is so supreme a privilege to be allowed to proclaim our glorious message that no word of complaint shall ever come from me of what it brings in the way of £ s. d." Another brother receiving £50 a year writes: "I have been labouring here for now forty years, and shall soon give up. But I am concerned for the man who comes after me that he may not have quite so hard a time as I have known." A third brother whose total income (entirely from endowment) is £130, a year writes: "Out of my stipend I pay for the gas and the cleaning of the chapel." Another with £90 a year writes: "To keep out of debt on such a stipend is almost heroic!" Almost—let me say, altogether! You see these men are not crushed; they can still pray and trust in God, and they display a wonderful ability to live without any visible means of support. But I want to ask you laymen if you think it is right that men whom you call into the ministry should suffer that strain and privation?

Uncertainty of Income.

I find that a more serious cause for anxiety than the limitation of income is its uncertainty; the necessity it involves for yearly applications to various funds—applications which are like begging for charity; the dread that next year one may have to do without a certain £5 grant, which perhaps means going through another winter without a great coat. Worse than the scantiness of the amount are the conditions by which it is secured—delayed payments—pitiable appeals to trustees of funds—the stipend to be called for and paid over the counter of a shop—things that eat into a man like a canker. You wonder why more of our educated youths do not enter the ministry. Under the circumstances I wonder at the presence of so many. These things and their like choke off many a young soul who might otherwise have added lustre to our ranks. It is not often that impulse and enthusiasm concerning the ministry are so strong in youth as to take no heed of difficulties. The best students I have known wanted a good deal of persuasion at the first, and were conscious of no mighty, overwhelming call before which any consideration of income seemed contemptible. It is rarely the compulsion works so strongly that the youth says, "Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel. What carries most men into the ministry is the pull of numerous forces, many of which he is quite unconscious. And in that tentative stage, before a man's life work is clearly seen this prospect of poverty, this uncertainty of decent maintenance, acts as a powerful deterrent. A young man does not expect much; he knows enough of the ministry to be convinced that it is no path of fortune; but, however small the income, he would like to be assured of its reasonable certainty, its freedom from begging letters and humiliating conditions, and its punctual payment.

Organise More Effectual Help.

Is it not time we reconsidered our methods of church and ministerial aid? With the best intentions in the world a great deal of our help does not help; with a good deal of generous giving our giving quickens no vital pulse; with considerable funds at our disposal, yet, from want of proper co-ordination, effective union, and a method of assistance better adapted to the conditions of our time, our funds do sadly and manifestly fail of adequate results. To go on day after day, giving just sufficient help to keep a drowning man's chin above water, is a depressing business. Either give him more help, or—let him go under and be put out of his misery! A fire that has smouldered for five-and-twenty years because it has been fed only with damp coal dust had better go out, unless you are prepared to kindle it into a life-giving flame by a more generous supply of fuel. You have sixty-nine ministers with stipends of less than £150 a year. It is true most of these churches would have ceased to be had you not come to their help. But having kept them just alive you have incurred a certain responsibility towards them to nourish their feeble life into vigour and usefulness. We are deceived by the fallacy that the number of our churches indicates the strength of our cause. Our cause might actually be stronger if we had fewer churches on which we concentrated our strength and made flourishing. I notice an almost feverish desire to spread ourselves, however thinly, over as wide an area as possible. But adequate assistance to one is better for the cause than inadequate assistance to three. Our laymen say to me: "Some of these churches are but barren fig-trees—why not cut them down?" But before the fig-tree in the parable was so severely treated it was given its chance—it was digged about and manured and stimulated by a generous husbandry. Many of these barren churches have never had their chance; the digging has been too feeble, the manure scanty, the husbandry too parsimonious. We ought to resolve that there shall be no accredited minister serving one of our churches with a less stipend than £150 a year. In towns the minimum should be £200. But let us take a step at a time. To bring up the stipends of these sixty-nine ministers to £150 a year requires an addition to our funds of £3,177 per annum. You will be relieved to hear that I do not suggest the raising of any new fund. Let us rather strengthen and wisely organise the existing funds—our Local Associations, the Sustentation Fund, the British and Foreign, &c. But given that, the need presses upon us of reconsidering how and on what terms assistance is to be given, and whether we ought not to devise some plan by which local effort shall be better stimulated, by which the stipend shall go on with reasonable certainty, and the ministers saved from all those humiliating devices and begging appeals which to a self-respecting man are most galling.

A Joint Maintenance Board.

This is the immediate task to which the Conference should address itself. Let the Conference approach the authorities of these and all other funds from which assistance is derived, with a view to the formation of a Joint Maintenance Board, through which all help shall be given. There are various Trust Funds for the augmentation of ministers' stipends; the British and Foreign devotes a certain portion of its income to the same object; the Local Associations give a large amount of assistance. I would have all these bodies represented at a Joint Board in proportion to the amount they dispense for this purpose, charged with the duty, first of all, of seeing that no minister in active service, whose name is worthy of being kept on the roll, has a less stipend than the minimum. There should be no more doles of £5 to one and £10 to another, given by small trust funds after an inordinate amount of begging and pressure. Neither would there be a series of appeals from a minister to the officials of half-a-dozen trusts for these petty grants. A yearly statement, on a properly prepared form, sent in to the Local Associations, and from thence to the Joint Board, would be sufficient, and the help would be given in one sum. No doubt there would have to be conditions complied with, local and personal, and such a Board might feel it necessary and possible to take steps which no one fund could suggest. It might institute in a given district the Circuit system—or it might affiliate two churches under one minister—or it might say, considering the numbers and local contributions, this church or that has no claim to a minister of its own—or it might turn a dying church into a flourishing mission. It would mean, also the sacrifice of little bits of individual patronage on the part of trustees, but in return, the representatives of trusts sitting at a Joint Board, would feel that they were serving the churches in a much more effective and satisfactory manner when co-operating with others in a large scheme than when acting alone. Further, it would have the immense advantage of securing that the same principles and methods of aid shall apply everywhere. If the funds of all trusts and societies now giving aid were dealt with as a whole by a thoroughly representative body, a great saving would be effected, much friction would be avoided, over-lapping would be impossible, no one would benefit by his tough pertinacity, no one would suffer because of his modest reticence. If any legal difficulty stood in the way of making a common fund, it might be arranged that the grant to one church should be paid out of this fund and the grant to another out of that. But the amount will be settled by the whole Board to which all applications will have to be addressed.

Let the Conference Committee take this Matter up.

Now I see that a dozen objectors are waiting impatiently to jump down my throat. But I shall elude them. For I do not ask that we should come to any decision to-day on so important and far-reaching a scheme. I can foresee many difficulties, and many points that want a great deal more elucidation than I can now give them. I have no time to enter upon necessary details. It is clear that much will have to be considered, and many relations amicably adjusted, before such a scheme can hope for general acceptance. All I ask to-day is that the Committee shall be authorised to take these suggestions into careful consideration, with power to enter into communication and conference with the authorities of the various funds and societies interested, and to submit any conclusions they may arrive at to a special meeting of the Conference to be held at such time as they may deem convenient. The Conference is in a favourable position for undertaking this work of consultation, mediation, and co-ordination, by the very fact that it has no funds of its own, and yet is representative of all the interests involved. Such a movement carried through would go far to weld our scattered societies into a church. Representing the churches as a whole, the Conference is not only justified, it would be neglecting a clear call of duty, if it did not seek to remedy the grievous ills of our present system and condition, by effort to secure the co-operation of all in such united action as will serve to show that our glowing language about brotherhood and fellowship is not empty rhetoric, but is prepared to translate itself into vital reality. It is said that the authorities of our various funds will never come into a general scheme, that they are too jealous of their patronage, too conservative in their habits, too much bound about by red tape, and half-a-dozen other things. I do not believe it. I will not believe it until the effort is made, and I shall not believe it then, for I shall pray and labour for their conversion. What! Is it not possible for men of a common faith, having one object in view, standing for churches which have difficulties more than others, and which more than others bear witness for brotherhood, to create a working union for the welfare of the whole? Does fellowship mean no more than coming together in a big meeting once in three years? Are we so going to hug our independence that we shall refuse for ever voluntary co-operation for the common good? I appeal to the larger sentiments of church life and associated action. Are we never to feel the warmth, the power, the momentum of a single, united community, moving hand in hand towards one high aim, thrilled by one expectation? Are our churches to be for ever lonely, fragmentary, separate, each left to struggle as it may, without any strong, deep sense of fellowship in high chivalry to care even more for the weak than the strong? Few, feeble, solitary, and scattered as they are, how much do they need the encouragement of loyal comradeship, the strength of union, the support of the whole felt in all its parts, and the joy of marching in step, one army, under the banner of freedom, light and truth!

Mr. JOHN DENDY, who opened the discussion, said:—We have this morning, and previously during the address of our President, listened to proposals, statesmanlike in their conception and far-reaching in their consequences, which make a great demand upon our careful consideration. They make an even greater demand upon us. They demand from us a broad judicial spirit, a mutual forbearance, a stern determination to put aside all petty jealousies and suspicion, and that we should rise above all merely personal preferences and privileges in an earnest attempt to consider the welfare of the whole of our little community. They will indeed search us and show what manner of men we are and what spirit is in us. Whether we ultimately accept or reject them, if we show ourselves capable of considering them in the same lofty spirit which has characterised the speeches of their authors, it will be a happy augury for our future. If we should unhappily proceed to fasten eagerly upon controversial elements and lose ourselves in a carping criticism of details, a great opportunity will be missed and, it may be, a final proof given of the impossibility of that closer union which is so ardently desired by many.

Mr. Wood has wisely asked that these proposals should be referred for fuller consideration than can possibly be given to-day. We cannot do less than assent to this. Their importance and the way in which they have been put before us alike demand it. I shall conclude with a proposal providing for it.

If then I now turn to certain other matters, suggested by the title of his paper, it must not be thought that I am intending to depreciate the importance of those proposals, with many of which I am in hearty agreement. It is partly because I am anxious not to precipitate discussions upon details, partly because there are these other matters to be borne in mind, matters indeed more than suggested by the noble sermon of our President.

Mr. Wood has drawn a melancholy picture of the condition of our churches. It is a state of things not unknown elsewhere, and largely due to general causes. We hear much, sometimes inflated, talk about our glorious message. Other churches use similar language. Yet the messages fail to draw the people. It is easy to blame the wrongheadedness of those who are deaf to them. It is more to the purpose to inquire what fault may lie in the churches. Mr. Thom said: "To preach theologies in the belief that through them we are making acquaintance with realities is an illusion of which the world never wearies." May it not be that the world begins to weary of the illusion and would respond better to the realities?

We have heard a powerful plea for a revived interest in public worship. But let us remember that we cannot compel people, unless they be very young, into our churches. If they are to be there with any profit to themselves or others, they must be irresistibly drawn by the feeling that they find there something which it is good to have, and which makes their lives better worth living.

Mr. Wood dwelt much upon two points: (1) Our need of larger, fuller life; (2) A better organisation of our forces. The two go together. An organisation which will not tend to promote a deeper life will be of little value. We do not want merely to organise the status quo. We want to be moved forward to better things, not in numbers and material resources only, but in life. We must seek a bond of union which will in itself be a stimulus to nobler life. More important than the question, "Shall we be united?" is the question, "On what basis shall we unite?"

We have one great ideal held in common by us all—that of freedom. But that, except in times of persecution, is no sufficient bond of union. Rather does it make for separateness. We may not have laid too much stress upon it, but have we not expected from it constructive work to which it is not adequate? For that constructive work three possible bases of union seem to offer themselves.

We might unite simply on the basis of mutual aid in matters of finance. I agree that there is much to be done in that direction. I welcome all well considered proposals, such as we have listened to to-day.

But would that alone meet our want of a deeper, fuller life? Surely not. That our churches have material needs is sufficiently obvious to them all. That they may be in even greater spiritual poverty is not so readily admitted.

Hegel, driven from Jena by the French invasion, wrote humorously to a friend, "I have made my guiding star the Biblical saying: 'Seek ye first food and clothing and the kingdom of Heaven shall be added unto you.'" What he said jestingly churches seem sometimes to say in earnest, "Give us only funds and buildings and all will be well with us." Yet it is not so.

We need large funds. We have raised them in the past. We can do it again. I believe we ought, in one way or another, to raise that fund proposed by the President, which has the glorious possibility attached to it of settling a long-standing difficult question. But let us not think that we shall have then done all that is needful. Have we not heard to-day how little our existing funds have done to stimulate life? Something has been done to mitigate the scandal of the ministerial stipends, and for that we may well be thankful. Yet it has but touched the fringe of that evil, which is the outcome of a painful fact—namely, that we do not greatly care for our churches, are not deeply touched by them. When men greatly care and are deeply moved they will freely give. Let us maintain, improve and organise our funds as well as we can, but let us also, if we still believe it, send to the churches the old message: "Seek ye first his kingdom and these things shall be added unto you." So shall we in the long run, I believe, bring the most effective aid to our sorely tried ministers.

One word about them. We put too much of our joint responsibility upon them. Part of our inefficiency may be due to them—not all the occupants of our pulpits are wise men in their right places—but a larger part is certainly due to us of the laity who too often by our personal jealousies and ambitions, our vulgar methods of finance, our lack of spirituality, and our low ideals of life, do much to bring our churches into disrepute.

Some think that the first need of our churches is an ideal ministry. How shall we get that? Not merely by offering better pay, greatly needed as that is; not mainly by conceding more direct authority, a course which might cause as many difficulties as it solved; but chiefly by creating among ourselves an ideal atmosphere of thought and feeling, in which it will be a joy to high-souled men to work and live.

A second course would be to seek a closer union on the basis of theological agreement. This could at most only lead to a union purchased at the cost of honesty and by the sacrifice of the principle of liberty. We do not all think alike on these matters. Still less shall we do so as the play of thought upon them becomes more really free. And let us not try to evade the difficulty by seeking to attach loose meanings to words. Language has its own sanctity, and, if we abuse it, will avenge itself upon our thought.

Moreover, if we could succeed in establishing a closer union upon such a basis, what would it mean? Simply that one more little sect, one more close religious corporation had sprung into existence to be a stumbling-block to future generations in the eternal quest for truth. Theological agreement can never be the ultimate and vital bond of union in a Free Church, much less in an association of free churches. Our union to be vital must be concerned with realities.

Where then shall we look for that which is to be at once our bond of union and the inspiration of our fuller life. Where else but to a common enthusiastic acceptance of the great Christian ideals of life and character? It may be objected, "these are taken for granted in all churches." Exactly so; and just because they are so taken for granted, and not emphasised as the first of things, they tend to fall into a secondary place and lose their uniting and inspiring power. In them we find something which is common to all, old and young, learned and unlearned, upon which all may unite, from which all may draw the inspiration of a fuller life.

What deeper need does any of us feel in the silent moments, when we are honest with ourselves, than the yearning for personal purity, purity in our private and public, in our social and business life? Do we also feel that in our churches we stand primarily for this great ideal, the beginning of all true religion; that when we join them we stand definitely pledged to it, and shall be definitely helped by the association with others pledged also to the maintenance and propagation, not of a scheme of thought, but of a type of life.

Then take the great ideals of brotherhood, love, service. They are, indeed, operative in the world to-day, but not always do we find their noblest exponents in practice within our churches. They go beyond the ideal of the Church, universal or particular, so far as I have ever been able to understand it. I fear I may seem to be indulging in the vague cosmopolitan generalities which Mr. Wood condemns; but we have cosmopolitan evils to deal with, and they must be met by cosmopolitan ideals. The world needs, above all things, as the one great cure for its social evils, its international jealousies, its sectional and racial antagonisms, an instructed goodwill which knows no limitations of place or church. Let our churches stand definitely for that.

Out of the foregoing springs the great ideal of national righteousness. Why do not the churches stand more definitely for that? Was the need that men should do so ever greater? Protestant Dissenters are to-day bitterly indignant at the injustice with which the nation through its legislature is treating them. But have they always stood so firmly for national equity, been so true in this matter to their own best traditions, that they have full right to complain now that the evil touches themselves?

It is not necessary that I should attempt an exhaustive list, but take lastly the great ideal of Reverence and Devotion; the willing submission of our souls to all that is greater and better than we, supremely to God, whereby we ourselves are lifted into nobler life. And consider these painful words of Dr. Martineau: "Yet after all it seems an easier task to make other Churches liberal and free than to make our own devout and high souled." Dare we repudiate that to-day, and if not, then need we look much further for a cause of our ineffectiveness?

Will this Conference put such things as these prominently in its programme? Will it call upon our churches to unite upon these great ideals, and give themselves freely to them? Will it adopt Dr. Martineau's other words addressed to the first of these Conferences: "Leave to the schools definitions of Doctrine. Let the churches address themselves with one heart, though in many tones, to the redemption of human life from guilt and sorrow"?

If so, then indeed it may hope to breathe new life into the churches, and to unite them on a basis in touch with realities and which need fear no shock, then it may create a spirit which will draw from its funds the necessary material support and be proof against any dangers which those funds involve.

I do not mean to depreciate theological inquiry or any kind of learning. Far from it. We need all the learning we can get for the enrichment of our lives, and to open up new visions of the Infinite. We need it as a weapon wherewith to combat the partial learning which throws doubt upon our soul's deep conviction of God. But my point is that there is something more needed still, more proper to be made the substance of our message and the basis of our union; and I think our churches might well ponder over lines written in a very different connection, but full of meaning for us to-day:

> Knowledge, we are not foes!
> I seek thee diligently:
> But the world with a great wind blows,
> Shining, and not from thee:
> Blowing to beautiful things
> On amid dark and light,
> Till Life, through trammellings
> Of Laws, that are not the Right,
> Breaks clean and pure and sings
> Glorying to God in the Height.

I have now to propose the following resolution with this one further comment only, that it commits us to nothing finally excepting careful consideration of the important proposals made to us:—

That this Conference directs the Executive Committee to take into careful consideration the proposals made in the President's address and Mr. Wood's paper, with power to enter into communication with local associations and the authorities of Societies, Trusts, and Funds, making grants in aid to churches and ministers or students for the ministry,* with a view to ascertain the possibility of common action, and further directs the Committee to report any conclusions and recommendations to a special meeting of the Conference at the call of the Committee.

Mr. W. BYNG KENRICK (Birmingham) associated himself with Mr. Dendy's expression of thanks to Mr. Wood, and seconded the resolution because it asked for inquiry on points which eminently deserved consideration. The suggestions as to the settlement and maintenance of ministers he regarded as of great importance, but to get to the root of the matter they must go further back, to the beginning of Mr. Wood's address, where he called attention to the fact that they required a revival of interest in public worship and a truer conception of the Church's ideal. Now, supposing he were to go to some of the members of what he had heard happily described as "the congregation of regular absentees," and ask him, or them, for reasons for their conduct—well, he could not say offhand what answer he would get, but it was conceivable that as a result of the question and answer he might come to some such conclusion as this. If they went back one or two generations they would find men very largely occupied in protesting against many political and religious disabilities which pressed largely upon them and upon other people. He thought they would also find that their attendance at their places of worship harmonised and completed the interests of their public life. He did not wish to be misunderstood in what he said; but in the highest sense their attendance at public worship maintained their position with regard to the facts of general life. Thanks to their efforts, those of his own generation were in a very different position, and they could not excite the same interest by inviting them to keep open an already forced open door. But now other great administrative questions had arisen and called for their attention, and he believed that there was, especially in large towns, a growing appreciation amongst the people of social needs and social responsibilities, and it appeared to him that in this connection, perhaps, as had also been suggested by Mr. Dendy, there was some hope that their churches might come in. They had been described already in that Conference as lacking in imagination. He thought that on the average that was true; but there were some things which, when fully developed, would touch the imagination of the most unimaginative; and it was these aspirations after social improvements which he thought would most largely touch their imaginations. It was also true that such aspirations would bear the best results when they were fostered by the warmth of loving and religious life. Thus the problem before them was to convince their absentee laymen that they could, through their Churches, arrive at a living religious communion which would bring the fruition of those aspirations which they were feeling. He was not so foolish or so young as to suppose that he was telling them anything new, but we was like all those people who, when they had just re-discovered for themselves a very old truth, liked to call their friends together to join with them in an intellectual feast to celebrate the occasion. It was for this reason that in the few words he had said he had not dealt with the details of Mr. Wood's paper, though they were infinitely worthy of consideration; but he had borne public testimony to his growing conviction that they were, perhaps, devoting too much time and thought to old controversies and missing their present opportunity.

* This clause as to students was added to the resolution, as originally moved, on the suggestion of Mr. Blake Odgers.

Mr. John Harrison (London) said he agreed with Mr. Wood that one great need of their churches was a well-organised movement for the improvement of the pecuniary position of their ministers. He felt strongly on this subject, and for obvious reasons. He was himself the son of a minister. He was born in a parsonage attached to a Unitarian church not far from the city of Liverpool, and he was also the descendant of many ministers who had laboured in that county. He should, therefore, be forgetting that which was due to the memory of those who had gone before him were he not to seize every occasion of raising his voice on behalf of those men who devoted their lives to the dissemination of that which they considered to be the truth. He could not help experiencing a sense of shame when he realised that many of their ministers were doing good work in small country districts for salaries which they, as business men, would not think of offering to competent subordinate clerks. This was a matter which did not concern merely small congregations. It concerned them all. It had long been his belief that they did not make the progress they ought to do because they did not give sufficient consideration to the material needs of their ministers. Unless possessed of independent means a young man desiring to enter their ministry, and having the legitimate desire to marry and settle, must make up his mind to endure many hardships. This question of salaries was one which had occupied the attention of some of their most earnest and most generous workers. He thought they might remove the uneasiness they all felt about it, not by disturbing existing organisations, but by deciding that they would, through the agency of their district Associations, adopt measures ensuring that no salary to be paid to any minister of their denomination should be less than £200 a year. He thought no better plan could be devised, because, even if Mr. Wood's suggestion were carried out, the existing funds, though combined, would still be insufficient to meet the proposed object. He had said that he would not disturb existing organisations for one very good reason. He was a business man, and believed that competition was good in all cases. A little friendly rivalry between existing organisations would probably benefit the underpaid ministry.

The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas (Nottingham) said that with all their spirit and life and enthusiam they were hindered by the lack of right instruments, right methods and adequate organisation. He pleaded for liberty to grow, and that they should trust the leaders who were opening new and better ways to them.

The Rev. E. W. Lummis (Leicester) referred to Dr. Martineau's saying, which had been quoted, as to their marching under six banners. He would adopt the military simile, and say that those were the banners simply of the different regiments of the same army; yet there was one general banner under which they were all marching. They might not all be able to read the inscription on it, but they all recognised it as the symbol of a real unity.

Mr. W. Blake Odgers K.C., suggested as an addition to the resolution to include in the scope of its reference the various funds for the help of students for the ministry. There were several little funds, such as the Holt, the Clough, and the Hackney College Funds, and it was extremely desirable that there should be co-operation between them, and that their aid to students should be given in a systematic way.

Mr. Dendy having accepted the addition, after a few words from Mr. Arnold Lupton, on the desirability of leading ministers preaching in public halls, the resolution was unanimously passed, and the Conference adjourned for luncheon.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

In the afternoon the Business Meeting was held, the President (Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter) in the chair. There was a good attendance.

The President read the rules defining the persons entitled to vote, and the Hon. Treasurer (Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke) then made his financial statement. This showed that about £47 remained in hand after the Conference of 1900, and £126 had been since received The expenses in the period intervening had been about £140, thus showing an apparent balance of £33. This, however, was illusory, as liabilities amounting to some £60 stood against it. The money received was collected mostly from private friends, but in 1901 an appeal for funds was made to the churches to provide for a paid secretary and other expenses. Only twenty-five had responded with contributions amounting to £33. It was felt that this sum should not be merged in the general account, but should be reserved till some further and more successful plan presented itself.

The President said that in view of the important proposals contained in Mr. Wood's paper read that morning, and the resolution referring them to the Committee for consideration, those who had been most anxious to promote the policy of appointing a pastor-at-large were of opinion that it would not be well at this juncture to proceed with that project. They were prepared, therefore, to withdraw the resolution standing first on the agenda paper, and if the meeting consented to that course, Mr. W. Blake Odgers's amendment would become the substantive resolution.

On asking for a show of hands, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed asked if fresh amendments would be in order now that it was suggested to substitute another scheme than that upon which the present list of amendments was drafted.

On the President's decision that fresh amendments would not be in order, further questions were asked as to the order of business, and ultimately the President announced that the Committee's motion would be submitted pro formâ, but no one need vote for it. (Laughter.)

The Conference having consented, on the President's suggestion, to take the report as read, he then, as arranged, moved the following resolution pro formâ on behalf of the Committee:—

That this Conference approves of the recommendation of the Committee that the Congregations constituting the Conference be invited to provide funds for a ministerial secretary, who shall also act as pastor-at-large.

Mr. A. H. Worthington, who had engaged to second the resolution, said he believed in it, and could not consent to do so merely to have it negatived.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal said he also agreed fully with the resolution, but in the present circumstances he saw the propriety of postponing a decision in that direction, and he would second it pro formâ.

Mr. W. Blake Odgers then moved the following amendment:—

That the Committee be authorised to appoint a paid secretary of the Conference who shall not be a pastor-at-large, and who shall not be required to give his whole time to the work.

He said when that Conference was started twenty-one years ago it was intended only for conference, and Dr. Martineau himself was of opinion that no active work could be done by it as a Conference. Those who started it appointed four honorary secretaries, who really acted as a small executive committee, and dealt with matters of detail; while the Committee had little else to do but make arrangements for the next Conference. Then, later, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal carried a resolution that the Conference should not be merely a deliberative assembly, but also have power to act. Since then the work had considerably increased, and it had been found that the plan of four secretaries did not work well. Besides, it was not reasonable to call upon them to give up their valuable time just when and how the Committee liked. They had done splendid work, but the motion of that morning's meeting involved a mass of details which must be dealt with by a paid secretary if expedition and thoroughness were desired. He did not think it would be necessary for the man to give his whole time, although, if in the future that became requisite, they would then have to make other arrangements. What was needed at the moment was a paid secretary who would attend all Committee meetings, conduct correspondence, and draw up statements and reports. The amendment would not prejudice the larger view held by movers of the original resolution, when the time was ripe; but it would meet the present necessities of the case.

Mr. H. CHATFEILD CLARKE seconded the amendment and the PRESIDENT then said he would accept it.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG said he felt himself in some difficulty owing to the unforeseen changes in the arrangement of business. The agenda paper had not been placed too early in their hands, and now the principal proposal upon it was submitted merely pro formâ. He should have liked to support the proposal for the appointment of a pastor-at-large, but he did not quite see how he could discuss that subject now. One thing, however, he did wish to make clear, and that was that there was no special "B. and F." point of view with regard to that subject. He had the honour to be President of the Association, and he knew the sentiments of the members of the Committee pretty well, and this was certain, each individual had his own views, and each spoke only for himself on this subject and not for others. He saw that suggestions were made in the papers that the ideals of the Conference and those of the B. and F. were antagonistic. The idea was ludicrous and absurd. As well speak of divergence between the two lobes of a man's brain. Why, their President that day was one of the most trusted and admired agents of the B. and F.U.A. Mr. Blake Odgers was ex-President of both the Association and Conference. He himself, as present President of the Association, was a member of the Conference Committee, and was the first to propose the formation of the Conference itself at a meeting of the Association. Therefore it was much to be desired that the friends of one and the other would cease the absurd and most mischievous habit of pitting one against the other. Organised for different ends, there was no incompatibility between them. He would call attention to the recent decision of the Committee of the B. and F.U.A., for its own reasons, for the present, to drop out of its scheme for larger work the appointment of a travelling missionary agent. So the Conference might be perfectly assured that if the scheme for a pastor-at-large were proceeded with there would be no opposition on the part of the B and F.U.A. They had heard the President's scheme for creating a grants-fund; so far as he knew, the B. and F.U.A. would be delighted to find any body who would take off its hands the duty of providing £1,500 to £2,000 for grants to churches and leave it free to devote its funds to educational and missionary work. He again confessed his bewilderment as to the programme of business before them —it confirmed his mistrust of the printed word—(laughter)—but he wished earnestly to plead with his friends to put away the idea of any kind of opposition between the two bodies. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED said he thought the position an unfortunate one. If they passed the amendment they would tie the Committee's hands, and prevent them asking a man to give up his whole time to the work of the Conference. Their ideal Secretary must have ample tact and business quality and wide sympathy in order to carry this affair through; and he must be prepared to give much more than his odds and ends of time to the work in hand. He would like, if possible, to reject both this and all the other amendments, and pass the original resolution, leaving the Committee to get out of the difficulty by their united genius. They must pass no limiting resolution. The pastor-at-large might have plenty to do without preaching. They wanted a man of good standing, of good financial ability, who might be expected to give his whole time.

Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS consented to withdraw the last clause of his amendment.

The Rev. J. WOOD said the point of view had altered several times during the past two hours, and one of the most important changes lay in the withdrawal of the proposal of the B. and F.U.A. to appoint a pastor-at-large. He believed very much in the policy of the resolution, but he was willing to accept the amendment now before them and to begin with a secretary, without prejudice to the right to propose the larger scheme at a later time.

The amendment, as above with the omission of the last clause, was then put and agreed to by large majority, and now became the substantive resolution.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD, who had put the following amendment on the paper, made a statement upon it.

That the whole question of appointing a paid secretary and a pastor-at-large be referred to a future meeting of the Conference to be called after the Churches have had an opportunity of considering the proposals made and instructing their delegates if they wish to do so.

He said he did not wish the amendment which stood in his name to be regarded as hostile or dilatory in its spirit, but as embodying a desire to give the Churches an opportunity of considering the scheme and instructing their representatives before a final decision was arrived at. There was everything to be gained by securing if possible the concurrence of the Churches beforehand, rather than deciding the question and then finding that the Churches desired the other thing. Some delegates were specifically instructed by their Churches to say they would not be bound by anything passed by that Conference unless they previously had the opportunity of considering it. He sympathised with what had been said by Mr. Armstrong. Their Churches had some functions appropriate to this Conference, and others appropriate to the B. and F.U.A., and as time went on they would have to adjust them. The efficiency of the Conference would be tested in three ways—namely, in maintaining the liberty, promoting the unity and increasing the efficiency of our Churches. When Dr. Martineau brought forth his great scheme he personally accepted it almost entirely; but in proportion as the idea of our Churches was merged into that of a Church which would take under its cognizance social, political, national and international duties, the differences amongst them would become more emphasised. In the periods of stress during the last three or four years, he felt glad there was no body qualified to speak for them all. Having consulted with members of his Committee he had concluded that it would be right for him to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. H. P. GREG asked and obtained leave to move the amendment in place of Mr. Harwood. He said the Committee would have liberty to act in its own affairs as it thought best, but the scheme of which notice had been given ought to be considered by the Churches.

Mr. A. NICHOLSON seconded.

Mr. J. DENDY supported the resolution, and the amendment moved by Mr. Greg was then put and lost.

The Rev. W. MELLOR had the following further amendment on the paper:—

That the whole question now before the Conference be referred to the Conference Committee with the instruction that that Committee puts itself into friendly communication with the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, with a view both to some basis of mutual action in regard to the matter in hand and to some general working scheme, as between the two organisations they respectively represent in regard to our Churches as a whole: and that the results of their deliberations on these vital questions be laid before their respective constituencies in such way and at such times as may be mutually agreed upon.

He said he was willing, with the consent of his seconder, to withdraw his amendment. There were three points he desired to emphasise:—1. They should give one another credit for perfect purity of motive. 2. Whatever the Conference says or does, it should recognise the splendid work done by the B. and F.U.A. 3. The Conference should be always prepared for future developments. He thought we were all more or less on the right track for doing great and good work.

Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, who was down on the programme for seconding this amendment, declined to withdraw, and insisted upon its being put to the meeting. He said that the presence of those on that platform was evidence of the fact that there was no antagonism between the Conference and the B. and F.U.A.; though there was in the nature of things an inevitable friction between them. They were doing the same kind of work and necessarily came into conflict with one another. It was known well enough that there was a Conference Party, however small it might be; but he did not know of a B. and F.U.A. Party as opposed to the Conference. They were all Unitarians whether they liked the use of the name or not. They were agreed on the great Unitarian principles; but on the other hand they were supporters of no dogmatic creed; they did not bind themselves or their successors to what they believed. Would it not be wise now that the Conference had attained its majority to define carefully its sphere of work? The Conference wanted a paid secretary, perhaps a pastor-at-large; but the work could not be done properly without the full co-operation and assent of the B. and F.U.A. He did not think it was essential to make the appointment immediately; but it was most important first to come to a clear understanding, and then report fully to the Churches. Delay would be amply justified, because it would prove a desire to join hand in hand with an Association which for many years had done admirable work in their midst.

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING suggested making the amendment a rider to the resolution now before the meeting.

The PRESIDENT said he looked upon the resolution passed by the Conference that morning as covering the sense of the present amendment and rendering it needless.

Mr. BLAKE ODGERS expressed a similar opinion, and urged that the appointment of a paid secretary was a simple necessity which should not be postponed.

Mr. MELLOR'S amendment was then put, and was negatived.

Mr. ARNOLD LUPTON suggested to leave out the words, "who shall not be a pastor at large," and, after several questions as to order, the PRESIDENT accepted the amendment, which was put and carried.

On the question of putting the resolution as amended the Rev. J. A. PEARSON objected that the Conference had not consulted the churches and local societies on this matter.

The resolution was then put and carried as follows:—

That the Committee be authorised to appoint a paid secretary.

The Hymn-book.

The Rev. J. WOOD said the idea of a new hymn-book had arisen some years ago in a private meeting, and having been brought up in the Conference Committee a sub-committee was appointed which submitted a report in favour of preparing a hymn-book with tunes. The Committee being equally divided on the project, the President voted for the status quo. He (the speaker) thereupon gave notice he would bring the subject before the Conference, and he moved as follows:—

That this Conference sanctions the publication of a [Conference] hymn and tune book compiled under the direction of the Committee, provided that the Conference is involved in no pecuniary responsibility.

The word "Conference" he wished to omit where it occurred the second time in the original proposal. He did not propose this in a spirit of opposition to any existing hymn-book, and as a believer in both the B. and F.U.A. and the Conference he only wished each to do its best for them all. The book he proposed would be under the auspices of the Conference, but it would only be an attempt to secure some uniformity in their worship in different parts of the country.

The Rev. H. GOW seconded. He thought the addition of tunes put the question of a new hymn-book on a different basis from that of any other. It was painful to find the same hymn sung in various churches to different tunes. It often amounted to outrage to hear a familiar hymn sung to an unknown tune. Identical tunes would bring the churches into closer harmony with each other. It did not mean competition with any existing hymn-books; and he strongly advocated the desirability of having a uniform hymn and tune book for the Churches of the Conference.

Mr. C. W. JONES said he did not understand the resolution in the least. If it was not to compete with or take the place of any other hymn-book, how was it possible to obtain uniformity? They had an excellent hymn-book in the Essex Hall Hymnal. At Ullet-road they had a special hymn-book of their own. He thought it wrong for the Conference to be asked to give an opinion of a hymn-book about which it knew nothing; but for which it would be responsible. If they authorised the Committee to bring it out they would, of course, be responsible for it. He, therefore, opposed the resolution.

The Rev. B. C. CONSTABLE suggested to refer the proposal to the Churches.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, in view of what appeared to be the feeling of the meeting, asked leave to withdraw his motion.

Officers and Committee.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL moved that the following be the officers of the Conference:—President, Alderman W. B. Bowring; hon. treasurer, Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke; hon. secs., Mr. Alfred W. Worthington and Mr. Charles Fenton; vice-presidents, Mr. J. R. Beard, Mr. W. B. Odgers, and Rev. J. E. Carpenter.

Mr. C. W. JONES seconded, and with the addition of the names of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal and Alderman Rawson as vice-presidents, the list was approved.

At this point the report of Committee and treasurer's statement were proposed by the PRESIDENT for reception. The report was printed in last week's INQUIRER.

The Rev. A. CHARLESWORTH objected to a passage in the report dealing with the Education Act of 1902 as ultra vires; but the reception was agreed to.

The following twelve names being the only nominations sent in for election, they were duly passed as the elective members of the Committee:—

Messrs. J. Cogan Conway, Percy H. Leigh and A. Nicholson, Miss Florence Hill, the Revs. Joseph Wood, J. C. Street, W. H. Drummond, J. Ellis, E. I. Fripp, H. Gow, J. C. Odgers and C. Roper.

The list of members of Committee appointed by societies is not yet complete.

The Guilds' Union.

The Rev. J. ELLIS then presented a Report of the National Conference Guilds' Union, which was received.

The Report recorded the progress of the movement for a Union of Guilds, originating in the paper read by Mr. Ellis at the Leicester Conference, on "How best to organise the Religious Life of our Young People." A sub-committee of the Conference took the matter up and promoted a union of all who were willing to accept the Guild Ideal, "To foster the Religious Life and inspire Personal Service." On May 30, 1901, at a meeting in Little Portland-street Chapel, a draft constitution was adopted and a council elected, with the Rev. Joseph Wood as chairman, Mr. H. P. Greg as treasurer and the Rev. John Ellis as secretary. The "National Conference Guilds' Union" was thus established, and proceeded to issue a Manual for the use of members and for guild meetings. The first annual meeting was held in Birmingham, April 1, 1902, when the Union included twenty-five Guilds, with a membership of 1,439, while eleven other kindred societies, with 504 members, also sent in reports. At the second annual meeting, held in Ullet-road Church, on the eve of the present Conference in Liverpool, the report showed thirty-four Guilds in the Union, with 1,934 members, and twenty kindred societies, with 538 members. The second Year-book has also been issued. The report concluded with these words: "It is with the absolute conviction that the efficiency and success of our Church and its good influence in the world depends upon the fostering of this spirit of devotion and service in the young that we commend this movement to our congregations. It is because we have attained a measure of success in this direction since the last Conference that we rejoice in presenting this report to-day."

Superannuation Fund.

Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, in presenting the printed report of the Committee appointed at the Leicester Conference to act in the organising of a Superannuation Fund, emphasised the special debt of thanks owing to Mr. J. Cogan Conway, Mr. D. Martineau and their President for their great and beneficent work. It was interesting to know that the rules had been sent to the American Unitarian Association, and that President Eliot had reported that in America a similar movement would, in consequence, be put on foot largely.

The PRESIDENT read a letter from the London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly, urging that steps be taken to make special provision for the aged ministers who were beyond the years provided for in the insurance tables. He said conferences had been held with important funds, and he hoped there might be a practical and satisfactory outcome of these negotiations.

The Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND moved the following resolution:—

That the Report of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund be received and entered on the Minutes, and that this meeting of the National Conference desires to congratulate the President (Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter) on the successful issue of his indefatigable labours and at the same time to place on record its deep feeling of gratitude to him and Mr. David Martineau, Mr. Cogan Conway and the other members of the special committee for the work they have accomplished.

He took special pleasure in doing so, as he had felt it his duty at a former time to protest strongly against the course taken in constituting the Fund: he acknowledged the accomplished fact, and trusted that all who could would promptly avail themselves of the benefits assured by the scheme now in force.

The Revs. C. J. STREET and F. WOOD added expressions of thankfulness at the great results attained, and the resolution was carried with applause.

The PRESIDENT, in acknowledging the vote, said the numbers of those who had already insured were a full justification of the zeal and hopes of Mr. Cogan Conway and Mr. D. Martineau.

Mr. CONWAY and Mr. MARTINEAU also briefly expressed their thanks for the kind reception of the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD C. CLARKE, to whose great services as treasurer the President gave eloquent testimony, said out of £21,919 promised all but £23 had been duly paid, and the income now was £990. There were thus funds for many more insurers, and he hoped the ministers would freely avail themselves of the opportunity presented to them.

The Rev. H. S. PERRIS withdrew a motion standing in his name in favour of the establishment of a "Conference Sunday," and the meeting then terminated.

A meeting of the Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union was also held on Thursday afternoon in a room at St. George's Hall, Miss E. K. McConnell in the chair. Miss Edith Gittins, Miss Tagart, and Miss Lucas were among the speakers, who dwelt upon various aspects of Postal Mission work. Mr. V. R. Shinde told of the beginning of Postal Mission work in India, and of the opportunity of Unitarianism in his country. India, he said, could take liberal, but not "orthodox," thought. Unitarianism cared little for the husk, but everything for the kernel of religion; and it was only the kernel his countrymen would accept. The Rev. H. Fisher Short told how the Postal Mission had brought him to Unitarianism. A vote of thanks to Miss McConnell, and to Miss Tagart and Miss Florence Hill for their devoted work, moved by the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, and seconded by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, brought the meeting to a close.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held in St. George's Hall, but, unfortunately, in the large hall a considerable proportion of those present could not hear the speeches. Before the meeting a selection of music on the great organ was rendered by Dr. A. L. Peace, the city organist.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, J.P., occupied the chair, and after the singing of John Johns' hymn, "Come, Kingdom of our God," at once introduced the first speaker.

Dr. JOHN BARLOW, of Glasgow, President of the Scottish Unitarian Association, spoke on the subject of "Religious Indifference: its Causes and its Remedy." He noted that during the last twenty years there had been a great increase of rationalistic views of the Bible and theology, and, at the same time, an increase of religious indifference. This was to be seen among Church members as well as among those outside, and, for his own part, while glad that their more reasonable views of religion should spread, he wished to see something of the joy of harvest in their churches. But too often they saw the enthusiasm and fire of converts to Unitarianism chilled by the indifference of those already within the fold, and there was far too much indifference in the matter of religious education. Speaking finally of the remedy for such indifference, and the leakage from their churches, he said they were living in a period of rapid transition. The Bible and the Creeds had been assaulted by scholars and men of science. Regarding the Bible, the results of criticism had been to increase its value by giving us an account of man's spiritual development, as shown by his idea of the "power, the world pervading." Regarding the Creeds, they could look on as interested spectators or take part in the assault, knowing that if Creeds were overthrown or modified, the most important spiritual realities would remain. If Jesus was no longer regarded as God the Son, he remained to them as an example and as a Leader whose loyalty to truth should be an inspiration to all of them. He remembered one of their ministers saying that a short creed of six words, emphasised and acted upon, would revolutionise the world. The words were familiar to all of them: "I believe in God the Father." He thought there never was a time when the ministers and members of their churches were more urgently called upon to be loyal to their belief. The assault upon the orthodox creeds and confessions, which, to his mind, had been less active of late years, should be vigorously renewed. But the assault must, in no case, be a mere denial. It was a poor victory which resulted in the overthrow of religious convictions without supplying a grander faith. The Unitarian affirmation must accompany the denial of the orthodox positions. He knew of some Unitarians who thought that church attendance was of no importance, and yet, it could be noticed, these persons joined other organisations composed of people with certain opinions in common, and found that the best way to attain the end they desired. And conduct, it was said, was more important than creed. But surely that depended upon the creed. If good, it was impossible for their conduct to be better than their creed, for their creed embodied their ideal, and their conduct might approach it, but could not entirely realise it. He thought more attention should be given by parents to the education of the children in their religious beliefs. This meant the Sunday-school. It could be done at home, but more efficiently, as in the teaching of other subjects, in a class by competent teachers. He did not think they were doing their duty, for if the children were not allowed and encouraged to attend, the efforts of their most zealous ministers were paralysed. The attendance at their Sunday-schools should culminate in church membership, preceded by some form of recognition service. Many of their members had strong objections to Liturgies and Communion services. The objections were based mainly upon the associations of certain words and phrases in these services in orthodox Churches. But such services might, and probably did help spiritual life in church members; and if the words employed embodied their faith, he could not understand why there should be difficulty in adopting a method which satisfied, not only the intellectual, but the emotional faculties. They would please understand that he had been scolding himself as well as other pew occupants. But they were all interested in the success of their cause. He believed they would succeed in proportion to their earnestness. They had a grand opportunity at present, and they were traitors and unworthy of their ancestry if, from apathy, they failed to obtain the victory for which they worked and prayed.

The Rev. L. P. JACKS, M.A. (Birmingham), whose subject was "The Religious Crisis," said that religion lived in a conflict with forces that seemed to be opposed to itself, and it did nothing but good to religion when a man of the character and ability of the late Professor Huxley found it worth his while to criticise it. The strength and the depth of a religious crisis showed the depth and the strength of the religion which was threatened by the crisis. When, therefore, a man of the worth and ability of Professor Huxley challenged religion, that was only a tribute to the dignity and the significance of the thing which he attacked. In these cases defender and assailer alike were the organs of a better religion than either of them was aware of at the moment. Let them not be afraid, then, of him who summoned their religion before the bar of reason and of conscience, of science and of philosophy, even though that tribunal might be hostile to them for the moment. Let them be afraid rather of the spirit of indifference which did not find that religion was worth a crisis. In saying then, as he did, that they were now in the presence of a great religious crisis, the question for their consideration was whether hey were prepared to meet it with a religion of life, health, and vitality. Unless he was greatly mistaken, the religious crisis which they and he were called upon to face came not from the doctrinal side, but from the ethical side. It was to his mind almost a question of conduct. The crisis of to-day was in the attempt to bring the Christian religion to the test of its own moral ideas,—to test the Christian religion in the light of its own ethical professions. Now, they were well aware that the Christian Church during the past two generations had passed through a very severe doctrinal crisis. The ethical crisis still lingered on, and would linger for many years to come; and when they looked back upon the shocks which religion has had to endure on the doctrinal side—when they looked back upon the critical and the scientific and the historical shocks that religion has endured; and when they looked forward to all that was still to come from the same quarter, it appeared to him that all these doctrinal crises were a comparatively small affair compared to the tremendous challenge which was now being directed against all sections of the Christian Church from the side of ethics and of conduct. All Christian Churches were affected by it more or less, and surely, if they could unite in nothing else, they would be united sooner or later in the attempt to provide a common answer to the demand of the conscience of mankind that they should reconcile their Christian professions with their daily life. The religion of Christ was intimately associated with a certain discovery which they, liberal Christians, had been largely concerned in both making and proclaiming. They had proclaimed that Christianity was not a creed, but a life. Well, so long as they were content to regard it as a creed, they were indeed exposed to the doctrinal crisis in its full force, but the ethical crisis would then touch them only in the second degree, but if they held that Christianity was not a creed but a life, then they must face the position; and ask, did they live that life? Did the society of which they were active and responsible members live that life? Did they realise the elements of the thing which called itself Christianity; and live up to the standard which it set forth? Was it lived by the Governments of Europe? Was it lived in either domestic or foreign policy? Was it lived by trade; was it lived by capital—was it lived by labour? Was that Christian life in the ecclesiastical policy of any of the great Christian Churches of to-day? Was it lived in the palace—was it lived in the slums? Should they look for the Christian life and its principles in those great systems which made the history of the world, or must they look for it only in the efforts of a small number of individuals who in the name of Christ gave their lives in order that they might undo some small fraction of the colossal havoc which these great underlying tendencies were for ever creating. Granted that Christianity was life, where should they look for that life in the existing civilisation? Did they preach Christianity as a life, and not as a creed? They preached doctrines, but they sowed dragon's teeth; and those dragoon's teeth were coming to life in the form of questions which challenged them to prove their own right to the Christian name. He did not think that they as Liberal Christians had ever yet realised the formidable consequences to themselves which flowed from the proclamation of the truth that Christianity was a life, and not a creed; and certain it was that the more they denied the dogmatic elements of Christianity the more they extended the ethical elements of the original foundation of Jesus Christ and the harder they would find it to prove, either to their own consciences or to the world that they themselves were Christian men. They were told that the central principle of the teaching of Jesus Christ was contained in the words—"He who loveth his life shall lose it, and he who loseth his life for the Son of Man's sake, the same shall save it." That was the essential principle of the teaching of Christ. How had modern Christian society responded to that principle? It had responded with the exact opposite. It had said: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth"; but had laid the foundations of its economic structure in the accumulation of wealth. It had taught the forgiveness of injuries; and yet here were the great Christian nations of Europe draining their resources, laying their noblest intellectual powers under contribution and spending more than half their revenues—for what? In order that they might have the means of promptly resenting the slightest injury that might be offered to them. Jesus said: "Resist not evil." How did they respond to that? They responded by the doctrine of the mailed fist abroad, and by the severities of the Criminal Code at home. Jesus said: "Blessed are the poor," but Christian civilisation had evolved a type of poverty of which it had been said, with what truth he left them to judge, that no form of human existence had ever been upon this planet so squalid, so forlorn, or so degraded. He would not weary them with a repetition of these familiar contrasts, which might be prolonged to almost any extent; but he did affirm that the awakened conscience of mankind was now challenging the Christian Churches to reconcile the two sides of those contrasts. He affirmed that the keen edge and point of that crisis turned, first and foremost, not upon those who said that Christianity was a creed, but upon those who said it was a life. It was by them that the first shock of that crisis would have to be sustained. He was afraid that Liberal Christians were somewhat apt to forget these things. Sometimes they might detect in the manner of the liberal Christian a certain air of superiority which seemed to suggest that the religious crisis was for his orthodox neighbour and not for himself, and sometimes they would hear him expressing surprise because the multitudes of instructed men and women to-day were not anxious to follow him into that place of safety which he imagined he had won for himself amidst the difficulties and dangers of the present day. He would suggest that the true reason why the multitude were not agreed to follow him was that the place of safety was not a place of safety at all. Of all positions in the religious world there were none more exposed to peril and to difficulty than his. The religious crisis was more difficult for them because it came not from bad men, but from good men. It was because men would be honest, it was because they would be consistent that they should, "If your interpretation of Christianity is a life, justify your rights to call yourselves by that name." He had ventured the opinion that this crisis was not by any means a hopeless one for the Church. There were many ways in which it could be met. They might meet it, and many men had done so, by abandoning the Christian name altogether, by refusing in the name of honesty to call themselves Christians; and helping the thought of the age by some non-Christian form of Theism; or, they might treat the ethical elements of Christianity as non-essentials, and fall back on those mystical elements; or they might fix upon some moral idea to fill the practical needs of the present day; or they might try to do what many were trying to do, they might try to show that the moral practices of the present, although they seemed opposed to the teachings of Christ, were nevertheless legitimately developed from the germ of that teaching; or, lastly, they might admit that the tendencies of the times were anti-Christian, and that their duty was to bring them back to the Christian basis. If they did that he could only say that they were of those who had his sympathy, because he seemed to recognise and find amongst those of them who were doing this the most earnest powers and the noblest spirits of the time. In conclusion he referred to those great works of mercy and beneficence which were so conspicuous a feature in Christian civilisation. He did not overlook the value of those things. They showed that there was in the heart of society to-day a splendid capacity for living the Christian life; but it was an undeveloped capacity, and it seemed to him to begin its work at the wrong end. It was a true Christianity which sought to heal the wounds of the world, but it was a truer Christianity which attempted to remove the sources of those wounds. It was true Christianity which produced the good Samaritan, but a truer still which sought to reform the thieves, and to teach them to go to business in a better way than by wounding and stripping their victims and leaving them to perish by the roadside. They had tried to cultivate a certain noble virtue—the virtue of veracity in religious expression. They had refused to say—we believe in this or that doctrine when we do not mean it. Now the conscience of the world was turning upon them, and saying—go and apply to Christian ethics the same principle of veracity that you have hitherto applied to Christian doctrine—when Sunday after Sunday you read the Sermon on the Mount, do you mean it? When you profess to be the disciples of him who gave his life as a ransom for the many—do you mean it? That was the religious crisis of the present day; and it fell first upon those who claimed that Christianity was not a creed, but a life.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED then spoke on "Religion: Nationality and Empire." He said he felt a certain embarrassment from the necessity, which none could regret more deeply than he did, of lowering the key to some extent, and breaking upon the impression left by the last speaker. Yet he trusted he should not be suspected of any desire to advocate compromise as a settlement when he said that he believed that they did expect that their religion and the religion of others—and he ventured to add, although it might be regarded as pharisaical, their religion more than that of others—should exercise a real, a definite, and a desirable effect upon their commercial and practical life. They expected it, and they were disappointed and disgusted and genuinely perplexed when they found a man who had every evidence of apparent sincerity in his profession of religion and his devotion to his Church who yet, in the temper and tone of his practical life, in the manner in which he conducted his business, and in the relative weight which he assigned to things, did not show any visible mark or impress of that religion. It would be difficult, and, indeed, impossible, to define it in any way which would bring it within reach of reconciling the Sermon on the Mount with the practices of the Stock Exchange; but, nevertheless, it was possible, he thought, to formulate to some extent what the nature of that influence was. Except in very few cases, it did not take the shape of any definite attempt to put into practice in the present world the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount as a guide to the practical conduct of the affairs of their business and their life, but it cultivated a habit of mind, and temper, and life, a course of conduct which recognised at least that material things, except up to a certain point, were means and not ends, and that the man who thought that material things were not only the most urgently needed, but the most ultimately significant things in life, had fallen a victim to moral and intellectual confusion, and had lost his whole grip of life. Therefore he believed that a religious life tended—and actively tended—to foster in them a certain readiness to accept opportunities that occurred, and to welcome tendencies of change in the industrial world which would reduce the share of the natural blessings of life which they enjoyed and increase that of others. He believed that among the religiously minded there would be found a readiness to welcome and to support any tendencies which would improve the condition of the wretched and strip of their greater wealth and comfort the more well-to-do. He believed that their religious life actually did something towards securing a temper and dictating a general outlook upon life which was favourable to any change in the direction indicated by Mr. Jacks. What he wanted to ask that evening was, Could they claim even the modest position which he had assigned to religion in their private and commercial life—could they assign to religion that kind of efficacy with respect to their sense of nationality and their aspirations of empire? They would see that he did not place the question high. He did not even ask, was our sense of nationality in harmony with the teaching of the Gospel? or were we attempting to build up the empire on gospel principles? He only asked them that evening whether our sense of nationality as an imperial nation was subject in its temper and in its aspirations to any such softening and mellowing influence from religion as he had assigned to religion with respect to private and commercial life. He was not going to speak about our national sins. He believed the Churches had done, and were doing, something, at any rate, towards challenging and checking our national sins. It was of our sense of nationality he wished to speak. That sense of nationality was one of the strongest things, and in many respects one of the most precious things, which fell to the lot of man. It was that sense of nationality which gave enormous significance and value to national independence. Yet they knew the tone of their countrymen abroad and at home, a tone of pharisaical contempt for the ways and practices and for the morale and character of other nations. Did our religion tend to humble and chasten that pharisaical spirit while fostering noble virtues? Did our religion chasten and deepen and ennoble our nationality till its reverence for itself became the gauge of its reverence for others? Passing from nationality to empire, they had to note the strange variety of conceptions which were covered by the phrase. Empire might be a mere extension of nationality; it might be the subjection of nations regarded as inferior, or, at any rate, as weaker, and we might find ourselves in the name of empire in command of a huge continent like India, with its august traditions of civilisation and of thought, on which we grudgingly bestowed about half a day in the year in Parliament. Empire might mean a combination such as that of Austria-Hungary, or it might mean the suppression of nationalities, as in the case of Poland and Finland; and if it meant the suppression or the absorption of other nationalities, it was the antithesis of nationality in one of two ways—either by a transfiguration of nationality into a yet higher and more broad-based community and intercourse of peoples, or by the murder of other nationalities and the suicide of our own, for the nation that murdered other nationalities killed itself. What, he asked, were the points of our nature which the imperial instinct touched? Had our religion done, was it doing, and would it do for our imperial aspirations what he had said he believed it did in our private and commercial life—exercise a steady pressure towards a nobler principle? He was perfectly aware of the possibility of the sense of nationality being so besotted and intoxicated as not to know the difference between maintaining its own honour and embarking on a course of murder and of suicide. Were we satisfied that our religion had been, was, and would be actively on the watch against the realisation of that possibility? They had all noticed in the late miserable and heart-searching experience through which this country had gone the softening of the feeling with which we regarded our late enemies—a decline of willingness to believe ill of them, a readiness to attribute to them virtues which we had denied to them, and a more sincere and genuine desire to be able to greet them as brothers. Was that change brought about by the religion of this country? Had the Church or the Army most to do with that change of sentiment? Could we trace the effective influence of religion either in chastening and softening our sense of nationality or in keeping our aspirations of empire on the high and noble level which alone could make them other than vulgar and brutal. He had asked his questions, but he would make no attempt to answer them. Let each one ask whether those great matters which had filled so much of our thoughts, and about which we had all cared more than for anything else, had touched and consecrated our sense of nationality and our imperial consciousness.

The Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. (Leicester), who was to have spoken on "What is a Unitarian Church?" said that he did not at all mind being crowded out by two such speeches as they had just listened to. At that late hour he would select from what he had intended to say what at the moment he thought the best worthy of saying, although he was afraid it was somewhat commonplace. He selected it, not because it was a truism, but because it seemed to him nevertheless to be true, and it was this. He thought that the distinctive characteristic of the Unitarian Church as a denomination—if it had any special virtue or any special principle—was that they understood in a somewhat different, but, as he thought, in a somewhat higher sense, the importance of truthfulness: truthfulness towards God which would not admit of any substitute for personal goodness; truthfulness towards themselves which would not admit of any make-belief taking the place of high belief; truthfulness towards other men which would not allow them diplomatically to conceal the truth, or to indulge, in sacred things, in that economic management which many years ago was denounced by Mr. John Morley. First there came truthfulness towards God. None of them could mistake what was the demand of God upon them. "What doth the Lord require of thee? To do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God." They believed that not merely because it was written in a sacred book, but because it was written in the heart and conscience of every one of them. In their attempt to carry out the logic of that belief—to translate into life that belief of theirs, that their religion should be a life rather than an opinion—in this attempt the appalling character of the difficulties that confronted them had been most eloquently and pathetically stated by Mr. Jacks that evening; but in looking upon those difficulties the true man would rather exult in their magnitude than give way to any feeling of despair. The sight of their greatness would nerve him, would inspire him to strengthen himself by the very greatness of those forces against which he had to wage a holy warfare; for they did not believe that any difficulties into which their faith in God led them would prove too great for them to overcome. Then as to truthfulness towards themselves, the absolute duty of a man was to think as cleanly and clearly as he could, and to set out honestly in his own mind the reasonable results of such a process. If they carried that out fully in their churches, how much of their present conventional belief would be cast aside, and in its place what a new confession of truth, what a new prophetic and clear insight would be the answer to their prayer. Then came truthfulness towards other men, which obliged them to tell out what they learnt whether it was in the way of a new denial or whether it was in the way of those more large and vague and general terms which underlay denial, and which, indeed, cover their desire to deny. There was a great work to be done in translating the phraseology of their religion into something which should be able to bear the message of the new religious truth. They must get out of the way of bribing the general ear by sanctimonious phrases which were inadequate to the reality of the new religion. That was the theme upon which he had been about to speak, and he submitted it to their own private deliberations, merely registering that firm belief of his that if they clung to that high principle, if they were not false to their special characteristic of truthfulness, they would be the most useful of all religious forces which, banded together, must indeed, at the behest of God, high in His heaven, regenerate the world.

The CHAIRMAN, in a few concluding remarks, spoke of the inestimable value of the tradition of their Church, unbound by any creed, as the most helpful for the sustenance of the Christian life, and the singing of the evening hymn and benediction brought the meeting to a close.

FRIDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

The Devotional Service on Friday morning was conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A. At the subsequent Conference Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., was to have taken the chair, but was prevented by Parliamentary duties from being present. His place was taken by Mr. R. D. HOLT, J.P., for the first part of the morning, and afterwards by the PRESIDENT, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A. A paper on "Our Obligations in Social Work" was read by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B.

OUR OBLIGATIONS IN SOCIAL WORK.

BY THE REV. CHRISTOPHER J. STREET, M.A., LL.B.

THE subject which has been entrusted to me is so large, and its title so ambiguous, that I have found no little difficulty in knowing how to treat it. Who are "We" that have obligations, and what is "Social work"?

Judging by newspaper controversies and conference discussions, we seem to have a good deal of doubt as to who "we" are. It is clear enough what we are not. We are not a Unitarian Church, whether it is desirable that we should be or not. We are not an ecclesiastical authority of any kind. We are not a delegation, with power to commit our religious societies to anything that we say or do.

We are, I take it, just a triennial gathering of ministers and representatives from a considerable number of self-governing congregations, whose names are legion, and whose independence is particularly assertive. The Conference, as such, can speak for itself, and ought to give forth no uncertain sound on everything that affects the moral and religious life of the nation; yet it does not commit the Churches. The constituent Churches have a life of their own, and, as such, have a definite relation to the community in which they are established and distinct duties in consequence; yet they cannot bind the individual members. The members, just because they have connected themselves with a Church, have emphasized their own obligations both to the religious society in which they elect to take a place and to the greater brotherhood which their religion enables them to discern. "We" therefore have obligations to society as individuals, as Churches, and as a National Conference of Church representatives.

My interpretation of the phrase "Social work" will not be narrowed to the consideration of what should be done to develop what is called the social side of our church life: I assume that no Church is worthy of the name if it does not try in every way possible to weld its members together, give them something to do and make them feel that they belong to a real fraternity. Nor shall I consent to the restriction of the phrase to that particular school of political economy which would make us all tenants and users in common of the outward things of life, with a view to the obliteration of distinctions and the equalisation of opportunity. By "Social work" I shall understand nothing less than work for the common weal in any way that may seem best, starting from the essential elements of religion which reveal our dependence upon each other, and the fact that salvation can only be found through service and sacrifice. Conference, Church, individual—each must work for the social well-being naturally and earnestly, whether it be by a united voice raised in maintenance of some great principle, by steady influence for good gradually permeating the neighbourhood, or by personal consecration to some task of practical philanthropy.

In our capacity as individuals I do not think that we need much stimulation towards social work. There are always laggards, of course, and unawakened natures for whom the call to service is still required. But Unitarians have ever been in the very fore-front of movements directed to civic and social welfare. They have not needed the whip to drive them to work: their faith has made them work; they could not help it. This readiness for public service is frequently acknowledged with much generosity by members of other households of religious faith: it often surprises them; it might be as well if they would seriously ask themselves what the real explanation is. A faith that works well cannot be altogether bad, for, if the test applied by Jesus is correct, "by their fruits shall ye know them." Look at the countless fields of public service to-day—the Bench of Magistrates, the County and Town Councils, the Education Committees (alas, I cannot say now the School Boards), the Boards of Guardians, the political associations of every party, the national organisations for the assertion of moral principles in the conduct of human life, the local philanthropic agencies; and who are so fully represented in proportion to their numbers as the Unitarians? We may be considered unworthy to take our place on the Evangelical Free Church Councils, but our presence and aid are welcomed and even courted when there is any practical good for humanity to be done, and not seldom it is the Unitarian who leads the way, and few be they that follow. In fact we are blessed, though in name we are banned—and nobody seems a penny the worse!

The duty of the individual member clearly is to render service to humanity where he can. Charity begins at home, and the first sphere of duty is in the family. But the larger family has claims that cannot be ignored. There are those who are less fortunate than ourselves, and the glory of strength is to render aid to the weak; the privilege of abundance is to minister to need; the worth of leisure is the ability to be of service. No man can live to himself alone and be a man. Liberty, equality, fraternity—all are excellent and essential; but there is yet a further word to be spoken, as Mazzini showed, and that word is Humanity.

"We must ascend to the conception of Humanity" (he tells us) "in order to ascertain the secret, rule, and law of life of the individual, of man. Hence the necessity of a general co-operation, of harmony of effort—in a word, of association—in order to fulfil the work of all." "The cry of 'God wills it' must be the eternal watchword of every undertaking like our own, having sacrifice for its basis, the people for its instrument, and Humanity for its aim." "The religious idea is the very breath of Humanity; its life, soul, conscience, and manifestation." "When that faith shall be not only upon your lips, but in your hearts; when your acts shall correspond to your words, and virtue shall sanctify your life, as liberty has sanctified your intelligence; when united, brothers and believers, and rallied round one sole banner, you appear before mankind as seekers after Good, and they say of you amongst themselves, 'These men are a living religion,' think you your appeal to the peoples will not meet with a ready response?"—(Faith and the Future.)

Mazzini's "Association" was nothing less than the Church of the Living God, whose temple is Humanity; and it is as members of this Holy Church that we are called upon to share in the life of our brethren and let them share in ours. Just so far as our own souls are rich in a noble faith shall we pour them forth in willing and loving service. The more of God we have in ourselves, the deeper will be our interest in human life and our desire to uplift, ennoble, and save.

Corporate Responsibility.

And if, as individual members of the Universal Church, we feel impelled to work for social amelioration, have we, as little groups of worshippers, drawn together by a kindred spirit and worshipping the One True God in spirit and in truth—have we, I say, no corporate relation to the work of the world? Surely in our association on the highest plane of life we shall stimulate each other to yet nobler service, and at the same time present an unbroken front to the common foe. In the name of the Most High our warfare is with sin, in whatever guise it may present itself. Everything that is mean and deceitful, every idolatry of ambition or wealth or aggression, every low standard in commerce or society or politics, must be faced and fought by the Church Militant.

The Churches, alas, are not always, perhaps not even generally, the true representatives of the Church of God. There are many who, like Mr. Hall Caine and Mr. Robert Blatchford, would tell you that the Churches are the greatest foes to social progress, and I am sorry to confess that, while such statements are too sweeping, there is too much justification for them. The small percentage of attendance at public worship is, doubtless, chiefly due to the people's indifference to the Churches, though hostility is also accountable for a good deal; but to what is the indifference due? Have the Churches shown the interest which they ought to have done in the people's welfare? Have they led the way of progress and reform? Have they set the example of self-denial and self-devotion which those who dare to take the name of Jesus upon them might be expected to do? Not for me to condemn: to its own Master let each Church stand or fall. But I say that the Church of Christ, and, infinitely more, the Church of the Living God, should be an example to the world in purity of life and eagerness for mutual service. Let me quote Mr. Hall Caine, the critic of the Churches, in this connection, and you can judge whether he speaks truth, and apply the moral for yourselves:—

> The Pagan conception of government is authority, and that alone justified the unconstituted rights, the inequalities, the barbarities, and the miseries that civilisation has for two thousand years been striving to break down. The Christian conception of government is right, and that asserts the value of the individual soul, the Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Men, and all that these imply in uniting mankind into one family.—(Speech at Gorton, Dec. 11, 1901.)

What a transformation of the world a Living Church would make! If all who profess to be religious were really banded together for service and sacrifice, what evil spirit could maintain its power over the hearts of men? Yet this would be nothing more than the fulfilment of the social ideal of Jesus. What else was his "Kingdom of God" but the "sweet reign of light and love"? Where was it to be found in the first place but here on earth, the forecourt of Heaven, and how was it to be ushered in but by personal faithfulness and mutual helpfulness?

The supreme test of a Living Church is to be found in the answer to the question, What is it doing for human welfare?

A Church must work first and foremost for the spiritual benefit of its members, then for the corporate welfare of the larger religious fellowship with which it is specially connected; and, last, but not least, for the enlightenment and elevation of the great human world outside its own boundaries. There must be no hostility between the Church and the world; until the two are concurrent and co-terminous both are incomplete and must be restless and dissatisfied. The world is the scene of the Church's activities; it is the garden wherein grows the tree of life; it is the material on which the craftsman must show the character of his workmanship. By this test he must abide. The actuality of his religion will stand or fall by it. If he fails to make the world better than he found it his so-called religion is a failure, and he must give place to a better workman.

God's intention is that every heart shall be His acknowledged dwelling-place, and that the whole world shall resound with the song of holiness, peace, and love. To extend the realm of this sacred rule is the specific function of the Church. It exists not for the merely selfish enjoyment of salvation by its members. Such salvation is cheap and deceptive, an imitation, and a dangerous delusion. The only salvation in a world of mutual dependence is to be found in cheerful service and ready self-sacrifice, responsive to the clear and inspiriting call of love.

The Church and the World.

No religious man has a right to draw a sharp boundary-line between the Church and the world. It is not for him, of all men, to say: "The world must not come in here, and the Church must not step in there. These things are sacred, and those are secular. Here a member of the Church should speak out, and there keep silence, as the Church has nothing to say about it. This is purely a question of business, with which religion should not interfere. That concerns politics, which have nothing to do with Christianity. This is a matter for the scientific men to settle by experimental research, without your sentimental maudlin morality being obtruded in the interests of the animals. Let religion keep to its own province and mind its own affairs."

No! Religion that is worth the name will have something to say, some guidance to give, some influence to exert upon every field and phase of human life. A real man's religion is the very breath he draws, the essence of his being. The business of religion is to regulate and control human life. Nothing is foreign to it. God did not make the conscience for one part of man's nature, the intellect for another, and the affections for a third. All must be in harmony; when they disagree there is something wrong. Religion is the proper adjustment of all the qualities which go to constitute our humanity. It is the alignment of human with divine law. It is the perception of the will of the Most High, and the consequent deliberate and strenuous attempt to lift our life to the level of this standard.

Religion, therefore, has a word to speak about every subject that comes under our cognisance. It need not be obtrusive, but it must be effective. "The word of the Lord" is not confined to the pages of a venerable book, or entrusted only to the lips of favoured prophets. It rings in the very recesses of our being, with its "Thou shalt not" and its equally emphatic "Thou shalt." To ignore it brings shame on our honour: to plead expediency as an excuse for silencing it is an insult to the Holy Spirit. We lose our status in the Church of God as soon as we tamper with His personal word for us, and condescend to bind our spirits to the earth when they know themselves to be heirs of an Eternal Kingdom. Every corner of human life is sacred, and it is we alone who by faithlessness can make it profane.

The Preacher of Righteousness.

The minister is the spokesman of the Church, and upon him devolves the honour—which is also a serious responsibility, and sometimes to his temporal welfare a grave danger—of speaking the whole truth of God as he understands it. Whatever his attitude as a man and a citizen—and he has as much right to perfectly free action in this respect as any other man—in the pulpit he must know no party, fear no person, ignore no truth, shirk no duty. If the Church is to bear faithful witness its servant in the pulpit must not be silent on grave moral questions that go down to the very roots of the nation's life. Above all party standards rise the higher politics, with which religion has always been vitally concerned. When the Church ceases to set the tone of political life, to whip out the money-changers who would degrade the house of God with their vile traffic, to raise the ideals of national honour and character, the Church itself is doomed and the nation decays. And when the man on whom the prophet's mantle has fallen, even if it be only that of a very minor prophet, allows it to drag in the dust, when he seeks an ignoble peace and pays the price of personal comfort by the sacrifice of his conscience, "the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him." Cost what it may, the true minister will speak the word of the Lord that has been committed to him. If it costs him his church, so much the worse for the church which forbids him the exercise of his religious liberty, and so much the better for his soul to be free from such thraldom.

Every Church should lead the way to the higher life, fearlessly point out what is wrong, and bravely set the example of what is right. As against the gambling spirit of the age, it can at least discountenance raffling at its bazaars. By way of war against the sin of drunkenness, it should throw its influence on the side of temperance reform by training the boys and girls, the young men and maidens, in habits of self-control and in readiness for self-denial in the interests of others, and by supporting every citizen's movement on behalf of sobriety and good order. Taking its stand against impurity, it should speak plain words to the young on the singleness of the moral standard for both sexes and associate itself with every effort to cleanse the life of the community. The Church should take the field on behalf of civic righteousness, demanding proper social conditions, physical and moral sanitation, equitable treatment of all citizens regardless of sect or party, civil and religious liberty for everyone, the best possible training for the young with sole regard to educational efficiency. The meeting of the St. Vincent-street congregation, Glasgow, held last month to decide as to a united course of action in the School Board election, is an example of a Church's obligation to social work put into practice. In the olden days, not a few of our congregations used to meet to take council on such social questions, and then they moved as one man. I for one regret that the spirit of this age has changed so much that we seem unable or unwilling to act together in this way.

The Poor and Suffering.

The problem of the poor and the suffering is always with us. Have we no responsibility as Churches towards society? and is it not incumbent upon us to lead the way in the remedy of wrong social conditions? Shall not the Church as a religious brotherhood demand that no man who is willing to work shall be allowed to starve or be degraded into a pauper; that a man who will not work shall be tabooed or taxed till he will; that every man shall give good work for his wages, and get good wages for his work? As a Church must we not do something in a practical way to relieve the suffering and raise the stricken? Our Domestic Missions to the poor have been an object-lesson to the world, showing how the poor may be encouraged to self-help and shown the way to rise above their hard conditions without suspicion of pauperisation. Our missionaries and workers have been enabled to get into touch with the real life of the people, ascertain and develop aptitudes, find out weaknesses and lovingly check them, bring the influence of a high and ennobling faith to lift men above their sordid surroundings into the glory of an ideal, and give to many a cramped soul its first chance of real life. All this is splendid work, and along such lines the redemption of society may be effected through the influence of associated men and women in whom religion is a power.

The Voice of the Conference.

And what shall we say of this Triennial National Conference of representatives of our Churches, and what of the lesser assemblies wherein we meet more frequently to take council with each other on the deep things of life? Are we not called upon to take our stand, as a deliberative gathering of leaders and workers, in regard to those great questions about which the best hearts have even been stirred, and to the settlement of which the religious spirit is essential? What is it that draws us together if it be not community of sentiment about religion? Anything that we say or do, we admit, it not binding, except upon those who say and do it. We cannot commit our churches; we cannot commit one another; but we can commit ourselves individually. If we speak our voice will be that of the workers, and a united utterance or effort means a momentum not otherwise attainable. Our unity is in fact greater than we seem able to find a name to express it by. Thorough-going Independents as we are, the fact that we are here together shows that we have much sympathy with each other, many kindred aims, and one common spirit of religious brotherhood.

To the things of the spirit we give utterance freely, and our thoughts are carried into a high realm of communion with the Eternal. Into regions of theological speculation, sometimes cloudy enough perhaps, we soar fearlessly, and we indicate our higher gospel to the world without troubling greatly about its divergence from the customary standard. Biblical and historical criticism we employ as a matter of course in our attempts to elicit and express the truth about the past. Are we quite so concerned about the things of the living present, the questions that vitally affect our mutual well being? Have we a social gospel, as well as a spiritual and theological one, to advance? Or are we in danger of falling into the very error we so constantly deplore, treating a small area of human life as a preserve for religion and all the rest as a barbarian's country? Do we agree with the divorce of the Church from the world, the soul from the body, the sacred from the secular; or does this not so narrow and cripple religion as to destroy its best life?

What have we, as a National Conference of chosen ministers and representative members of living Churches, to say about those great social problems which affect our nation's welfare—the unevenness of the human lot, the class distinctions aggravated by unbrotherliness, the code of morals in society and business, the shirking of work and the scrimping of wages, the herding together of the population of our great cities under disgraceful conditions, the submerged tenth, the over-provision of public-houses and the shameless inducements to vice which necessarily ensue, the reckless gambling spirit of the age, apparent not only on the race-course, but in the drawing-room, in the workshop as well as upon 'Change. Have we no word to speak, in our religious capacity, about the solemn questions of peace or war, of conciliation or tyranny, of the treatment of native races, of the forcing of a hated and demoralising traffic on a reluctant nation, of the breach of faith with another people when a solemn pledge is recklessly broken?

Differences of opinion we must have whenever there is independence of thought, but this must not paralyse speech and action; and as a National Conference of Unitarians and Free Christians we ought to have some message for the world as to every part of human life. Our spiritual gospel has been so faithfully preached that many another Church finds inspiration in our devotional literature. Our theological gospel has been so tellingly presented that harsh creeds are giving way before the larger thought of God and the eternal hope for man. Let us not be behindhand with the gospel of social emancipation and progress, set forth not only in lives personally consecrated to human service, but also in united support of the principles of freedom and justice, love and righteousness, whereby we may prove our love of God by love of the brethren.

The Rev. W. J. Clarke (Birmingham), who opened the discussion, said he was in most cordial agreement with the paper, and dwelt upon one aspect of the great problem, which he felt to be of the most urgent importance. He referred to the elaborate inquiries of Mr. Charles Booth and Mr. B. S. Rowntree as to the poverty in great cities, and quoted further statistics from Birmingham showing the proportion of dwellers in single rooms, the percentage of paupers, and the appalling death rate in the poorest quarters. He showed what light was thrown on the subject by the experiences of the Police-Aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children, and declared that human speech was powerless to describe the cruel sufferings and degradation involved in the present conditions of city life among the poor, the ruthless destruction of body, mind, and soul. While he held that Parliament, the County Councils, and Municipal bodies betrayed their great trust, if they did not make amendment of those evil conditions a most sacred obligation, yet on no institution did that responsibility of moving heaven and earth in one supreme effort to grapple with the problem rest so clearly and directly as on the Church of Christ. His belief in God and the God-like things of which human nature was capable was too deeply rooted to doubt the possibility of the task to be accomplished. Their domestic missions were making noble efforts, but unhappily those isolated efforts were little better than palliatives. The whole Christian Church must arouse itself fearlessly to undertake the discovery and application of remedies. So only could they give reality and inspiring power to their talk of human brotherhood, and make their twentieth century Christianity more like what Jesus Christ intended it to be.

The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, M.A., said they could not but feel that they had been baptised afresh for that great social work, but they must strive to keep themselves up to the level of that high resolve from day to day completely given up to the service of mankind. It was no longer the salvation of their own individual souls that must be their aim, but the salvation of humanity. When men were thinking of great things their lives were apt to be touched with greatness. It was so with nations, and so it was with the Church. When the Church made its own organisation the chief end it lost its greatness; its end must be united service of mankind, the salvation of the human race. Yet they must remember that the individual life was the seat of all that is holy and great; not in vague abstractions of society, but in individual homes of men and women the great drama was enacted. The ideal of man in his social relations and his individual relation to God was the Holy of holies, sacred as the body of Christ was the most sacred thing to the Catholic. Just as the Roman standard bearers leapt into the midst of the host of the enemy knowing that the soldiers must follow to defend their standard from disgrace, so God had put the standard of humanity into the worst places of the earth—all that was most holy to them was there in the midst of those awful evils, and they could not rest till they had redeemed their standard, and brought it back to the light, as it was already in the love of God.

Mr. W. Wallace Bruce (L.C.C.) asked why the artisans and labourers were not touched by their presentment of religion, and referring to the experience of Mr. Crooks, the newly-elected member for Woolwich, a workhouse boy who had become Chairman of the Board of Guardians that sent him to school began to answer his question, but was stopped for lack of time. The Revs. J. Warschauer and W. Reynolds, Mr. Arold Lupton and Mr. V. R. Shinde each added a few words, and the discussion was brought to a close.

The President then moved a very cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Charles W. Jones, the Chairman, and the other members of the local committee, and especially to the Rev. H. D. Roberts and Mr. B. P. Burroughs, the secretaries, and to all friends who had given such abundant hospitality to the members of the Conference.

This was seconded by the Rev. C. Hargrove, and supported by Mr. David Martineau and the Rev. J. A. Kelly (on behalf of Ireland).

Mr. Charles Jones, in acknowledging the vote, strongly urged that the next meeting of the Conference should be held at Oxford.

The proceedings of the Conference closed with a paper by the Rev. W. J. Jupp on "The Doctrine of Forgiveness and the Law of Reconciliation," followed by Samuel Johnson's hymn, "Life of Ages, richly poured," and the Benediction.

THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS AND THE LAW OF RECONCILIATION: A STUDY OF HUMAN EXPERIENCE IN THE LIFE OF THE SPIRIT.

BY THE REV. W. J. JUPP.

As life advanced upon this planet from lower to higher forms of consciousness there entered into it, far back in the remoteness of time, a strange and new experience. Or it may be more truly described as an awakening or uprising from within of what before was latent and slumbering there. It was an inward movement, fraught, at first, with trouble and distress—a kind of fearfulness and trembling, as of something wrong or alien to nature and the law of justly ordered life. Somewhere in the living creature's conscious self a note of discord sounded, and the harmony of creation seemed disturbed and broken. At what stage of life's long movement of advance this happened we cannot tell. What living creature it was, erect or on all fours, which felt, however lightly, this inward trouble of estrangement first, we shall not discover now. No record is kept of that earliest ancestral penitent. We can but say that when this sorrow as of some alien will was clearly felt, the life we now call "human" had begun. The pain of imperfection, the sense of something wrong, suffered in the creature's secret consciousness, marked the stage of sure attainment to the human levels: the higher plane of feeling and of action had been reached. Rising into this strange and new experience, man turned aside, or drew himself wistfully and mournfully away from lowlier forms of life, and entered on that uphill path which, often with so much stress and strain, he is pursuing still.

He must have travelled far, along this difficult and toilsome road when, at length, his inward trouble shaped or defined itself into what now we call the "sense of sin." That cry which the old dramatist puts on the lips of Job, "I have sinned; what shall I do unto thee, O thou watcher of men?"

indicates a great advance, and a somewhat sad remoteness from the rest of creation. I have tried sometimes to think myself back into the experience of one who first uttered himself thus, and to realise the strength of emotion that must have stirred within him. The splendour and isolation of some noble sorrow seem to gather about his form. Millions of other creatures, sharing life with him there, know nothing of his dark distress. His fellow beings, less vividly self-conscious—the wild free children of forest, wold and hill—follow the impulse of desire and are not sad. Man is alone with his strange deep inward grief. And still to-day, though tears of penitence and wrestlings of regret have accompanied his life on earth so long, all the other creatures have successfully resisted the contagion of his grief. And one bold and loud-voiced poet of our time has praised them for this, as showing a healthier nature and stronger self-possession.

I think I could turn and live with the animals, they are so placid and self-contain'd,
I stand and look at them long and long.
They do not sweat and whine about their condition,
They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins,
They do not make me sick discussing their duty to God,
Not one is dissatisfied, not one is demented with the mania of owning things,
Not one kneels to another, nor to his kind that lived thousands of years ago,
Not one is respectable or unhappy over the whole earth.
So they show their relations to me and I accept them,
They bring me tokens of myself, they evince them plainly in their possession.
I wonder where they got these tokens,
Did I pass that way huge times ago and negligently drop them?

(Whitman: "Song of Myself.")

Ah, no, he did not "negligently drop" those "tokens"; he had found and kept fresh tokens. This strange new trouble falling upon man's spirit, was the sign of larger, deeper life working within him. His grief for something wrong was but the shadow cast by the shining of some higher right. He thought he was wicked, and seemed to have broken some law of life. But in truth he was even then just beginning to be good. Yes, we may say it now quite fearlessly, that when man felt that he had sinned he was a better and nobler being than before he felt thus, or had any reason to feel thus. The conviction that he had done wrong meant that already he had begun to do, or was preparing himself to do, some loftier right. His self-condemnation was his "new birth"; his death, because of sin, was his resurrection to a life of righteousness.

Not thus, however, could he read the new experience then. The trouble of his spirit increased and deepened within him. It created, I suppose, the first religion—the religion of fearfulness and dread. The ways of life grew dark and he moved along them under the frown of some imaginary Being, watching from above in stern displeasure. This Being, so man thought, was offended, and threatened him with penalties. He was afraid and hid himself among the trees of his garden, lest the wrathful One should find and punish him. He offered sacrifices in hope to appease the angry Power and win his favour. He sued for mercy; he prayed to be forgiven.

Slowly, alas! how slowly, his thought took higher and happier range. The wonder grew and brightened into hope—the hope that perhaps, after all, the Deity, whose laws he seemed to disobey, was not the pitiless and vengeful being he had surmised. Finding some grace of tenderness in his own heart, he came to think that such might be also in the heart of God. And so, at length, there dawned upon his mind the conception of some over-brooding goodness—the faith in a merciful one who could be just and yet also gracious to erring human folk. It was feebly apprehended and enjoyed at first. Sacrifices still were offered; myriads of innocent creatures suffered death at the hands of men to express their sense of guilt and win the favour of heaven. And then, at last, the theory was devised of One who had appeared on the earth in the form of man, who did no sin, but lived a just and holy life; and this One, moved by love and sympathy for all the rest, had given his life as an atonement for their sins—offered the full and effective sacrifice, which gathered up into itself all other and less perfect forms, and expressed and transcended and so abolished them for ever. And henceforth they who believed in him and pleaded his atonement were pardoned—their iniquity and its punishment were condoned and put for ever away.

Thus, in part, men escaped from the religion of fear into the religion of meditorial force, and many rejoiced therein. Yet this was only another stage in the advancing life of the spirit. And already, in our time, a few have passed beyond it and have reached what seems to them a happier, holier air. A faith more bracing, joyous and free has come to them, presaging thus, it may be, the liberation to which, in the greater fulness of time, the minds of all men shall attain.

An Illustration from Life.

I will venture to speak of this loftier range of religious thought by telling you of one, intimately known to me, who in his own mental history passed through some at least of those stages of faith by which, as I have roughly indicated, the race has advanced, and is advancing still. The real interest of my story lies in the issue of its somewhat tragic struggle—the deep and ineffable joy which greeted the imprisoned one as he emerged from a great spiritual darkness into the light of reconciliation and great peace.

He was born and brought up under the religion of fear. He was told as a boy that he had sinned against an awful and holy Being—that he deserved, and, unless something happened, would surely receive, the punishment of eternal woe. It was possible, if a certain change took place within him, that he might escape this. But the possibility was somewhat remote, and the gloom of present wickedness and of threatening future misery haunted the years of his boyhood and early youth. The eye of that offended Deity watched him always, taking note of every evil thought and word and deed. Up to the age of eighteen years the darkness of this religion of fear lay upon his spirit. Nor was it his own fate alone that harassed him. He was told in sermons, he heard it from the lips of those who loved him, he read it in the only religious books accessible to him, that upon nearly all his fellows lay this dread shadow of impending doom, and only a few were ever likely to escape. He found at length some comfort, albeit of a selfish kind, through coming to believe himself one of those favoured few. He thought the Christ had died for him, and he might therefore be forgiven. He sought refuge in the Atonement, and gathered to himself a little quietness of conscience and solacement of heart. But still on all the human world lay the deep, dread night of sin, and above it watched the wrathful Holiness which could with difficulty be, to any, gracious and relentful.

And then, one summer night, it happened to this burdened youth that he was walking alone over a wide grassy common, ascending its gentle slope, as the sun went down in the far north-western sky. And there came to him then, he knew not whence or why, a new thought, a fresh vision or conception of life and its own ruling Power. Across the wide green earth on which he trod, and filling all the space above, far into the softening splendours of that light-filled sky, the presence of a silent brooding love seemed making itself known to him. A strange sweet spirit of kindness and good will compassed him about; a tenderness touched him like that which had looked forth in other years from his mother's face and quivered in her voice when it addressed him—like that, but infinitely greater, vaster, more intense. And from that hour religion ceased to be a painful mystery of dread. Love entered into life, and, in part, dismissed its fear and dispelled its gloom. But only in part. His mind was not yet free, nor conscience granted her full right of cheerful confidence and hope. Some of the old theories still clung to him. The trouble of sin could be escaped, it seemed, only by faith in a holy sacrifice which met the just demand of Heaven. Sin must be forgiven by being atoned for and so remitted. And for some reason, dimly guessed at then, his mind could find no rest in that belief.

Still, something had been won, some vital truth of experience in religion gained; and with this, the man whose inward struggles I am hinting of in these poor words began to preach to his fellows. For the little he had gained, though crude and cumbered with old dogmas, was very real to him, and pressed for utterance. He entered a Free Church College, and in due course became a recognised minister of religion. But he was never quite at ease or strongly confident. The doctrine of forgiveness still troubled him. It harboured elements that seemed alien to liberty and dissonant with love; and in time he came to doubt whether, after all, it had any real place or significance in the soul's advancing life. "I'm afraid you are not quite sound," his good orthodox Professor had said, as he bade farewell to him at the college door, and gave him his theological blessing on going forth to life's untried experience. But being "sound in the faith" did not appear to him, even then, quite so grave a matter as being true to the faint glimmerings of light that were beginning to shine for him on other paths of thought. That old, time-honoured theory of "atonement," by which justice was satisfied through the sacrifice of a holy being for the sins of the unholy, failed him utterly. He saw that something darkly unjust was involved therein. Mercy on such terms was itself devoid of moral truth, and could not, therefore, be a saving force of life. And yet forgiveness pure and simple, as a condoning or ignoring of actual sin, was hardly to be thought of. A Deity of mere good nature, generously excusing man's misdoing, and granting to repentance the same favour which was granted to obedience, hardly claimed the soul's true reverence or assured trust. And, finally, after long gropings and wrestlings of thought, this doubting one came upon the gravest doubt of all. He dared to question whether the very idea of "forgiveness," as most men conceived it, was not an illusion, because their main conception of "sin" was false. This last doubt rent the spirit's bonds and set the prisoner free; and, passing into a new world of religious insight, he was made to see that it was not pardon for wrong things done, but reconciliation with righteousness yet to be done, that alone could save and satisfy the upward-reaching soul. The Law that formerly appeared to him as some rigid code of rules, which himself and all others had broken, was revealed to him now as a wondrous and most beautiful Ideal of good, towards which, so blindly and through such devious ways, he, and doubtless they also, were aspiring. Sin was his failure to reach it; the sense of sin was his own consciousness of failure—and yet, also, it was his inward response to that Ideal's attraction or appeal. The gloom of remorse, as of some awful guilt, lying darkly on the soul, was seen now as the shadow cast by the pure light of holiness, falling on his poor imperfect deeds. The moral Law could not be broken; it was there in its divine integrity of right—God's eternal order of the good and true and fair; but he had only in part perceived and imperfectly obeyed its wise behest; calmly, and with infinite patience, it seemed to have been waiting for him to understand, and then to yield himself, in joyous reconciliation, to its claim. No longer was it needful that another, holier than himself, should suffer to win the pardon he had no right to ask. No longer was he moved to plead for mercy at the hand of an offended Deity. The All-pure could not be other than gracious towards the imperfect children of men struggling into the light. Roused by this new vision of wonder and joy, and turning from the past with all its failures, his heart went forth in love towards that shining Ideal of right which now, by its constraining and exacting grace, claimed all the ardour and devotion of his liberated spirit. And he knew that thenceforth life must be one long and slow advancing purpose of good—a movement of unbounded and unconquerable hope, and in that hope the whole mind and conscience and longing of the man found rest, and by that hope he, and all who with him felt the moral impulse, were assuredly redeemed.

The Witness of Prophecy and of Science.

What have we to say concerning the issue of an experience such as this? Has it anything more than a personal and individual significance? Will it seem to any either reverent or rational thus gently to put away beliefs for which men have wrestled so long, and fearlessly presume on a law of reconciling grace, in things pertaining to the moral and religious life? It has, in truth, some high prophetic sanctions. It must have been, for example, the faith of one, against whom the reproach was urged, "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." The method of Jesus was, we cannot doubt, to infuse great cheer into the mind of erring but repentant men and women. Sinning souls were strangely dear to him, and words of hope came swiftly to his lips. Angels in heaven rejoice, he said, when one repenteth. The father calls on all the household to make merry when the prodigal comes home. "Go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice." "Hath no man condemned thee? Neither do I; go and sin no more." He makes no reference to sacrifice or atonement when men repent. The past is buried; the future beckons, radiant and glorious with its promise of good. I suppose that to many this attitude of mercy and hope still seems but solemn trifling when they turn from the Gospels to the confessions of Augustine or the groanings of Bunyan or the sermons of Richard Baxter or John Knox. And yet the highest ethical view of life brings us nearer to Christ than to them. Reason is with the gracious, not with the gruesome treatment of human shortcomings.

For if it be true, as science now assures us, that all this strange and troubled history of our race be the result, not of a fall or a disaster, but of a slow uprising from lower to higher planes of life, then the sadness of sin should naturally and promptly merge itself in the joyfulness of good. Not condemnation but encouragement would seem to be the lawful and just method of deliverance. For such an uprising could not be other than a struggle, attended by more or less of failure, in all who felt the strong ambition to advance. "A spark disturbs our clod." A moral impulse wakes the new desire, while yet old habits claim their rights and yield them only inch by inch. The consciousness of failure means the consciousness of higher good, waiting to be won. Nay, it must be the soul's own sure response to the higher claim. In confessing sadly to himself, "I have sinned, I have transgressed, I have failed to keep the laws of God," the suffering one is really saying, "There is a better life than this that I have lived; there is a good more wise and fair than any I have yet achieved; I believe in that good and love it and aspire towards it, and long to be at one with it, in purpose and in action."

The Ethical Value of the Gospel of Reconciliation.

This surely is the true psychology—the real significance of man's sense of guilt. He could not feel himself sinful did he not also see and love and long for a goodness that is at once beyond and yet within him. And this, therefore, is what he needs to know and joyfully keep his attention on. It is not well for him to brood and pray over the irrevocable past. It is not wise for him to linger, wondering and doubting whether its failures are forgiven; neither is it right for him to wish that the natural consequences of what now appears to him wrong should be condoned or escaped. He should wish manfully to accept whatever results pertain to deeds, and even thoughts, that he must henceforth disapprove. How much better he might have done or ought to have done, no one now can tell. He thinks he should have done better than he has—that he could have done all that his Ideal now claims of him is not conceivable. The finite is always the imperfect. "None is good save one, that is God." Sin, in the sense of failure to be all that we may hope yet to become, is inevitable; and what has been done or left undone in the past, is, with all its rightful issues, irrevocable. Stay not, then, says the religion of divine courage, stay not pleading for mercy, waiting to be forgiven, wishing to elude what men call "punishment for sin." Banish your fears, and cease your penitential moans. Up and follow your ideal of good; follow the gleam before you; linger not over the gloom behind. Progress is life's great moral law; and progress means imperfection. None is good, and none is bad; it is a question of more or less, in every human life. Sins are plentiful enough, on every hand, to him who dreams the dream of righteousness. Fallings and failings beset us all; but it is for ever true, for every living soul, that "We fall to rise, are baffled to fight better, sleep to wake." There is a profound truth, if not the whole truth, in the words of Thoreau: "To say that a thing is wrong is not to say that it ought never to have been, but that now it ought to cease to be."

Taught, therefore, by the modern view of human development, and sustained by the example and high authority of Jesus, we may venture to trust this happier insight which to some, though few as yet, has been so freely granted. I would even dare to ask whether we might not now give up, without reserve, the old doctrine of forgiveness, and claim for this Gospel of Reconciliation the fullest acceptance and regard? May not the lower yield its place to the higher in absolute surrender? I could almost wish that the very word "forgiveness" might become merged and lost in the greater word "reconciliation." For however we interpret or define, we know that the whole theology of pardon is inevitably associated with the idea of some kind of sacrifice offered to an offended Deity, or else with the idea of escaping the natural consequences of error and transgression. What, then, if there is no offended Deity to be appeased, and nothing but folly and cowardice in wishing to elude the issues of a law so sacred as, "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap"? But reconciliation—the assurance that, however I have failed and fallen, and whatever I must endure by reason of that, the goodness which I love and long for still loves and longs for me; that the Divine Spirit of Life, whose laws I have dimly understood and feebly obeyed, is too wise and holy to be alien or wrathful towards its imperfect children—is, in truth, for ever friendly and gracious, sweetly and strongly drawing them into closer union with Itself—that is a conception which frees us at once from all dark thoughts of God, and from the illusion that to evade the natural consequence of ill-doing can bring us any good. Moreover, this conception, stripped of the old crude theories of pardon, once realised and responded to, brings with it a confidence in the exhaustless energy of the good we love, and affords that strength of moral inspiration which for ever saves from defeat and surrender and despair.

Healing by First Intention.

And observe how wide is the application of this law—how wondrously it reveals itself in actual life on every hand. If I do but break a limb or wound my flesh, Nature brings into play her healing powers. Set the limb, staunch and cleanse and cover up the wound, and lo! some hitherto latent energies, waiting there, as if to be ready for emergencies, come into action and minister with strong restoring grace. How beautiful is that phrase you hear the doctors use sometimes: "We want to let nature heal by first intention." And when the opportunity for that is granted her, when harmful influences are kept away—if, of course, the injury be not a fatal one or too subtle for man's skill, as yet, to find the right conditions—how surely effective is that "first intention" oftentimes. And how suggestive is that very word "intention," which the man of science applies to Nature. How it carries one's thoughts into mysterious realms of physical action, hinting of gracious secrets there, and wakening within us the faith that a "law of reconciliation" may pervade the whole universe of life.

And in the moral realm that law is found prevailing more and more, as men rise in intelligence and insight and love. We live in fellowship, we make social existence possible or endurable, only by obedience to it daily. We could not get along together, in any department of human life, were we not constantly recovering ourselves and maintaining our social relations through the exercise of our own human reconciling grace. By reason of our imperfect knowledge, our lack of mutual understanding, our differences of temper and clashings of interest, we are constantly failing in justice, one to another. It is probable that I offend against some of my fellows every day, failing in my duty towards them. But they do not take offence; they do not turn away from me and refuse their friendship. And why do they not? Because they forgive, we say. And it is a good word; we know what it means. But it is not the best word. Strictly, we cannot forgive; we cannot condone or annihilate the wrong. The hasty utterance, the cruel silence, the selfish deed, the unjust thought—these cannot be put away; they have entered into life and its history; they are irrevocable. But the generous heart refuses to be alienated by them. The law of reconciliation prevails; and often, so gracious are many souls, the restoring power comes with such swiftness into play, that the wound is healed by "first intention," and love creates new peace, and kindles in the offending one the hope and the energy for nobler behaviour from that hour. And is your thought of God less beautiful and bold than this that is so true of man? Is not man's heart then "likest God's, when mercy seasons justice"?

Let the Darker Thoughts be put away.

I think the time has come to let this law of reconciliation have larger place in our religious thought and life. The darker view of moral failure, with its halting sense of possible forgiveness, was doubtless inevitable, and even until now some men must think of human imperfection as incurring the anger of the Deity, as needing oftentimes much wailing of contrition, and even some appeasing sacrifice to win reluctant mercy and elude the rightful issues of wrong-doing. But the clear insight of Jesus saw it otherwise; and Paul knew the inspiration of that wiser Gospel when, though counting himself the "chief of sinners," he exclaimed, "We also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have received the at-one-ment—the reconciliation."

And now the story of man's slowly emerging moral life, as told by science and history, comes in to give us reason for this joy. Through the long process of evolution he has come to know his higher destiny. That tasting of the fruit of the "tree of knowledge of good and evil" was not a mere yielding to temptation. It was the beginning of his moral life. He was not meant to stay in the paradise of innocence; and sin but marks the inevitable stage between that and the heaven of holiness to which he aspires. Let him know this and shake off his gloom. "Even the light that led astray was light from heaven." His wandering from low levels of unconscious obedience was, in truth, a climbing towards the heights of purposive duty. His sinfulness was the imperfect response of his nature to the stirrings of saintliness, dimly apprehended and half blindly followed. And whenever he discovers his delinquency, and is regretful, and the sense of guilt troubles him, he should know that nothing but his own ideal of good could move him thus, and he should turn his heart thither—should look up to that ideal, as to the shining face of God, watching and waiting to cheer him on, in the way of progress and nobility of life.

Despairing of no Man.

Sometimes dark deeds are done which seem to banish hope. As disease or physical injury may prove too great for Nature's law of healing, so moral wrong may seem to strike so deep that no recovery is possible, and no grace be strong enough to save. That is conceivable; it looks so often. But we do not know; we cannot measure the strength of recuperative power in the human soul. There may be always a reserve of moral energy that no waste or waywardness of vice can ever exhaust. My faith is that it is so; but the problem is too profound for human insight here. What we need not doubt is that while the sense of wrong remains the chance of right is ours still. The sense of sin must always carry the possibility of salvation. So long as you can suffer you may hope. When a limb has been frostbitten and hangs lifeless and painless, the great thing is to bring back feeling, to make the man conscious of suffering there. The first twinge of pain gives assurance that the limb may be saved.

And in the life of the spirit, to be able to grieve for any sin, however vile, is to be within reach of deliverance. And the secret of recovering strength is faith in the law of reconciliation. Believe that the powers of goodness are not alien, but friendly still; think of them as being on our side, claiming us for all virtue, and the victory is no more doubtful, though the fight be stern and long. Love is there with all its inspiration—not lenient, but exacting; gracious, but demanding highest effort. For "the law of love is not the abrogation of the law of struggle; it only represents a better way to fight." It is the way of hope and courage and cheer.

A Gospel for the Free Churches.

Fear we not then to hold, to live by and to preach, a gospel of Reconciliation. Hold it, not as a mere sentiment of good nature, or a sign of laxity in judgment, or a softening of the moral will, but as a reasonable law belonging to the realm of ordered progressive development. Trust it in all efforts to recover from disaster and defeat, and preach it by word and deed to a struggling world. It is the gospel men need to hear and obey. Amid the strife of classes and sects and nations it should come as a voice from Heaven, and yet also as a message from the inmost heart of man. It should call us from our broodings over the problem of evil and from our morbid disputes about vice and its penalties, and from our fears as to the future of the race. It should keep our faces towards the ideal and fill our hearts with undying hope for ourselves and for our fellows.

And these Churches to which we belong, free from the old dogmas and the dark creeds of other days, how strong they might be to preach this religion of joy. If the enthusiasm of that evangelist who came over to Europe, nineteen centuries back, crying to men, "We pray you in Christ's stead, Be ye reconciled to God," could be ours, with all the larger interest which should now attach to such an exhortation, what strength of inspiration might possess us. "Be ye reconciled to God; we also pray you in the name of Christ, and in the name of Humanity, in the name of Reason and of Righteousness, in the name of Law and of Duty and of Wisdom and of Truth—be ye reconciled to God, to Nature, to your own hearts and to one another, since all are striving, however feebly, towards the same great goal of goodness and of love." Such is the Gospel committed in trust to the Free Churches of to-day. Preach it to men. Preach to them, that anger and wrath and revenge, that alienation because of sin, that despising of ourselves and of others because of misdoing, are inhuman and undivine. Preach to them, that the law of reconciliation is supreme, that penance and moaning and misery because of the past are not required and will only mar the present and betray the future. Ever before us the paths of progress reach, and the ideals beckon, and the heaven of goodness waits as our inheritance of victory and of joy. "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

Preach it, this law of reconcilation, for it is the hope of the world and the harmony of all confusing and contending things; and he who lives beneath its sway shall know that the heart of the universe and his own heart are at one—that he dwells for ever with God, "in whose will is our peace."

And may this spirit of unity and fellowship come upon us all at the close of these great assemblings together; and may it prosper within us and around us on the untrodden ways which we must travel in the times that are yet to be. May we return to the work and the wonder and worship of life, conscious of the truth and sweetness of the old words: "So then we are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of God," which household shall finally include, we may not doubt, the sinners also, seeing that they, too, are saints in the making; and that all shall come "in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto the perfect manhood, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

In the afternoon a Ministers' Meeting, which was largely attended, was held in the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, where a service of devotion was conducted by the Rev. E. P. Barrow, M.A; and after tea in the meeting-room an informal conference was held, at which the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG presided.

In the evening a very successful Temperance Demonstration was held at the Domestic Mission in Mill-street, under the presidency of the Rev. T. LLOYD JONES, when addresses were given by the Rev. J. C. Street, Mr. Richard D. Holt, Miss H. M. Johnson, the Rev. F. Allen, and others; and resolutions protesting against interferences with the discretion of Licensing Justices, and in favour of direct Veto, were passed.

Too late for the meeting of welcome to foreign delegates, the secretaries received a letter from the Rev. C. E. St. John, Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, with cordial greetings, and notifying the appointment of the Rev. W. S. Key, of Boston, as representative of the Association at the Conference. Mr. Key was not able to be present at the welcome and only arrived later in the week, but it is pleasant to know that our American brethren intended to be thus officially represented, while we had, in fact, the privilege of receiving their greetings through the welcome presence of Professor Toy.

As to the numbers present at the Conference the returns sent in of Ministers and Delegates were not such as to give us any confidence in the attempt to compile a complete and accurate list. The secretaries' list of ministers and other members contains 420 names, and something over 200 returns from congregations were sent in to the local secretaries. At the service in the Philharmonic Hall probably some 1,300 persons were present; at the public meeting in St. George's Hall, 1,600; and at the Conversazione in the Walker Art Gallery, over 2,000.

The Report of the Conference Proceedings here completed, in this and the last number of "The Inquirer," is to be at once reprinted in book form. The Editor will be grateful to any friends who note misprints or mistakes in the Report, if they will kindly draw his attention to them.

OBITUARY.

MISS ELIZABETH SMITH.

HYDE CHAPEL, Gee Cross, has lost one of its best known and most highly respected members by the death of Miss Elizabeth Smith, who died on April 21, at the age of sixty-three. About sixteen years ago she was elected a Guardian of the Poor for the Stockport Union, and sat upon the Board continuously up to the time of her death. She enjoyed the distinction of being the first woman guardian to be elected in the whole of either Lancashire or Cheshire, and was about the fortieth in England. Though her re-election was contested on several occasions she was always returned at the head of the poll by large majorities. She took a leading part in the formation of the Hyde Women's Suffrage Society about twenty years ago, and of the Hyde Women's Liberal Association, and was a vice-president of the latter. She was the honorary secretary of the first Ladies' Ambulance Society in Hyde, and at the time of her death was the honorary secretary of Hyde Boarding Out of Pauper Children Committee, and an active member of the Sick Nursing Association Committee, and a manager of the Gee Cross Undenominational Day School.

A CONFERENCE IDEAL.

SIR,—It occurs to me to ask, as one of the strongest impressions left by the Conference, does not the Committee try to get too much into the time, and is not discussion consequently unduly curtailed?

As I have the honour of being elected on the Committee, I should be glad, as a guide to my future action, to ascertain, through your columns, the opinion of my constituents as to whether it would not be better in future to have fewer Papers and more time for discussion; and further, whether five minutes is not too short a time to allow to those who wish to take part in the discussion?

These are great subjects that we discuss, and there are many men whose contributions would be valuable, who positively cannot get under weigh in five minutes, but if they were allowed ten, they could give us something of substantial worth.

CONFERENCE HYMN AND TUNE BOOK.

SIR,—In reply to many correspondents, will you kindly allow me to announce that although the resolution was withdrawn, the book will be proceeded with immediately, and will be published in the course of a few months.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

"ASSEMBLY SUNDAY."

SIR,—I shall esteem it a favour if you will kindly allow me space to remind those of your readers who are connected with our churches in London and the South-Eastern Counties that on May 10, "Assembly Sunday," collections will be made on behalf of the Assembly, and, in the name of the Committee, to express the hope that the result will be a considerable addition to the funds of the Assembly, so that its operations may be still further developed.

FREDERIC ALLEN,
Hon. Secretary.

April 29.

THE adjourned trial of Mr. Gottfried Schwarz took place on the 16th ult., before the Schwurgericht at Mannheim, and our readers will learn with satisfaction that he was unanimously acquitted on both counts of the indictment. He was fortunate in having a jury made up mainly of Protestants; but, on the other hand, both the President of the Court and his two colleagues were Catholics. The trial has excited wide attention in Germany. The Berlin Tägliche Rundschau says that "the personality of the accused, and the extraordinary force of the speeches of himself and his counsel, have made the trial an event of first-rate importance in the sphere of ecclesiastical politics," and describes the verdict as "a brilliant victory for Protestant loyalty to conviction." In face of this verdict it is scarcely likely that the Roman Catholics will attempt again to take advantage of Section 166 of the German Penal Code in order to suppress public criticism of their doctrines, and Mr. Schwarz will find in this fact a compensation for the anxieties to which the prosecution has exposed him. His English friends will be gratified to know that it was their help which enabled Mr. Schwarz to retain the services of Dr Franz.

A MEETING of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday afternoon, the President, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, in the chair. The Committee's report was presented, and several matters of interest were discussed. A report of the meeting we must reserve for next week. A report of the Choral Competitions of the London S.S.S. at Essex Hall on April 25, we must also hold over. Highgate was the successful choir.

THE debate on the second reading of the London Education Bill, which began on Tuesday and ended on Wednesday, showed two things—first, that Mr. Balfour does not mean to drop the measure, in spite of the chorus of condemnation with which it was greeted on its introduction by Sir William Anson; but, secondly, that he is willing to accept considerable modifications in Committee. He adheres to two "fundamental principles"—namely, the supremacy of the London County Council, and delegation of administration to the borough councils. How these principles are finally to be embodied in the Bill is a question for the ingenious; the attempt indicated in the Bill as it stands will assuredly have to be abandoned. That much is certain.

IT is noteworthy that in addition to severe criticism by members on the Government side of the House, the proposals of the Bill have been repudiated by a meeting of Unionist members for London, who, like the Bishops of London and Rochester, demand the strict subordination if not exclusion of the borough councils; by thirty-five members of the School Board, men and women of different parties and sects, who insist on the need of a specially-elected education authority; and, most significant of all, by the London County Council, which, by a vote of sixty-four to sixteen, declared in favour of the same principle, that is, for an ad hoc body. Even the borough councils themselves, to judge by the declarations already made by a considerable number of them, are against the Bill. And still Mr. Balfour, having his "friends" to please, and holding the Nationalist vote in hand for the present, will persist that it is a very good Bill, and one full of benefits for education in general and Nonconformists in particular.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Dukinfield.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached at the Old Chapel last Sunday (April 26) by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. The afternoon service was conducted by the Rev. H. S. Tayler, and an interesting address was given by Mr. Hopps on "What is Conscience? Where does it come from? What is the use of it?" The chapel was bright with wild flowers and the children's faces and their white dresses. Large congregations assembled and much enjoyed the services. The collections amounted to £69, a substantial improvement on last year.

Dundee.—On the eve of his sailing for a visit to America, the Rev. H. Williamson was entertained at a congregational meeting, and expressed his gratification at the many cordial expressions of goodwill that he received. The Rev. D. B. Cameron spoke in kindly terms of Mr. Williamson's public work, and his hearty sympathy with his efforts for the benefit of the community.

Hull.—On Sunday, April 26, the Sunday-school anniversary was held at the Park-street Church, when Miss Marian Pritchard, of London, conducted two of the services. At the morning service, having taken for her text 1 Cor. 9 xxiv., "So run, that ye may attain," she referred to the different aims which men set before themselves in life. A comparison of these ends, often legitimate and even praiseworthy in themselves, led to a statement of the relation in which they should stand to the true end—the formation and strengthening of right character. At the afternoon service and prize distribution there was a full muster of the school, many parents and old scholars also being present. Miss Pritchard gave a most interesting address, which was closely followed by even the youngest children. She afterwards distributed the prizes to the successful scholars. At both services special hymns were sung, under the leadership of Mr. Ernest Rymer. The evening service was taken by the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, who secured the earnest attention of his hearers to his powerful plea for the teaching of reverence in the training of young people. On Monday evening Miss Pritchard gave a lecture on "The Book of Job," followed by a concerted reading of the version she had prepared. Miss Grace Holmes read the prologue, and the parts of the three friends were taken by the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, Mr. S. Harris, and Mr. Donald Wilson; Miss Pritchard read the speeches of Job, and also that of the Voice of Jahweh; and Mrs. Walter Holmes played incidental music on the piano. This same version, it will be remembered, was read last summer at the S.S.S.S., at Manchester College, Oxford.

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association.—The quarterly conference took place at Banks street Church, Blackpool, on Saturday, April 25. After tea, at which about 120 were present, a musical convention was held in the church. The choirs and friends of Banks-street Church and South Shore, Blackpool, Preston, Chorley, Lancaster, and Kendal, contributed to the programme, and also joined in a combined choir in rendering "Be not Afraid," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Mr. M. Ingham, of Blackpool, conducting. The whole of the programme was quite a success, the Rev. J. Channing Pollard, of Lancaster, presiding, and the Rev. D. Davis, of Blackpool, supporting.

Padiham.—Anniversary services were held at Nazareth Chapel on Sunday last, when two powerful sermons were preached by the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne. The subject of the evening sermon was, "What the Unitarian Church Stands For." Mr. Walters very finely pointed out that whilst Unitarians do not bind themselves to any creeds, yet they believe their Faith to be most affirmative in its nature and full of pure Christianity. Mr. Walters also gave the address in the morning. The choir rendered the anthems, "Her ways are ways of pleasantness" in the afternoon, and "The Lord is my Shepherd" at the evening service, under the guidance of Mr. Thomas Marsden. Mr. Fred Holland very ably presided at the organ. There were fair congregations, and the collections amounted to £30 12s. 7d.

Pendleton: Manchester.—The church anniversary services were held on Sunday last, April 26, the preacher being the Rev. R. Travers Herford, B.A. Large congregations attended both morning and evening services.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., acknowledges with thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mr. H. Young, 10s. 6d.; Mrs. Rorke, £1 1s.; Mrs. Bayle Bernard, £1; Lady Durning Lawrence, £5; Miss Dora Lawrence, 5s.; the Misses Withall, 10s.; Miss E. Stroulger, 5s.

To CORRESPONDENTS. — Letters, &c., received from the following:—B. P. B.; A. C.; A. W. F.; L. O. H.; V. H.; H. A. R. J.; A. L.; W. M.; W. J. N.; A. W. Several communications and items of news are crowded out this week.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Ready To-day, with about Seventy-seven Illustrations, crown 8vo, cloth, 5s., Authorised Translation of

BABEL AND BIBLE

By Dr. Friedrich Delitzsch, Professor of Assyriology in the University of Berlin.
Being Lectures delivered before Members of the Deutschen Orient-Gesellschaft in the presence of the German Emperor.
Rev. C. H. W. Johns, of Queen's College, Cambridge, will edit the Volume and write an Introduction.

These are the Lectures which have caused such a sensation in Germany, and which called forth the letters from the German Emperor on the Inspiration of the Old Testament.

They explain in a clear and popular manner the universal importance of the discoveries made in Babylonia, and demonstrate the influence which Babylonish laws and thought must have had on the writers of the books of the Old Testament.

In the Press, nearly ready, stiff wrapper, 6d. net.

PROFESSOR HARNACK'S LETTER TO THE PREUSSISCHE JAHRBÜCHER

ON THE GERMAN EMPEROR'S CRITICISM OF PROF. DELITZSCH'S LECTURES ON BABEL AND BIBLE.

By Adolf Harnack, Professor of Church History in the University, Berlin. Translated, with a short Introduction, by T. Bailey Saunders.

New Work to be added to the Theological Translation Library.

Vol. I. Nearly ready. Demy 8vo. Cloth.

THE BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTIANITY.

By Professor Paul Wernle, of the University, Basel. Translated by Rev. G. A. Bienemann, M.A.

FROM SOME OF THE REVIEWS OF THE WORK.

"Not all Professor Wernle's views will recommend themselves to his readers; it is neither necessary nor desirable that this should be so. On some points, it may be, his verdict will appear one-sided, on others, inconclusive or inconsequent. But no English book covers the same ground as Die Aufange unserer Religion, or is conceived with the same breadth and sanity; in few works in any language are learning and philosophical judgment so happily combined."—From the Pilot (London).

". . . A book which will be read with eager interest by every expert, and what is more, perhaps, by many a layman; at least, so we would hope."

". . . This book is based upon thorough investigation of the subject, and among the many attempts to present the development of New Testament or Primitive Christian ideas, constitutes a class by itself."—J. F. Holtzmann (Strassburg), in Deut. Literaturzeitung.

"I have not for years met with a book so likely to advance and clarify thought as this most taking work of Wernle's, free as it is from all pedantic padding. So buy, read, and read again!"—Protest. evangel. Gemeindeblatt, Nov. 23, 1901.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

COPIES of THE INQUIRER of April 25 and May 2, containing the complete report of the proceedings of the National Conference at Liverpool, can still be had, and we trust that friends throughout the country will do their best to secure a wide distribution for these numbers. The thousand copies of the reprint in book form, which will be ready shortly, should be quickly taken up for use by the churches themselves. The remaining copies of THE INQUIRER are more convenient for distribution by post for missionary purposes.

OUR reports of the speeches at the public meeting will not be reprinted in the book. With the pressure of matter which had to be dealt with in last week's INQUIRER, it was not possible to submit the reports to the several speakers, and we fear that they are far from accurate. Indeed, we have received a letter from the Rev. L. P. Jacks declaring that the report of his speech is so full of mistakes, rendering his points so unintelligible, that he feels obliged publicly "to disclaim responsibility for any statement printed therein." As he shrinks from the task of revision, our only course is to refrain from reprinting the report. One mistake we will point out. In Mr. Jacks's speech there were some "dragon's teeth" sown, which incontinently in the very same line sprang up as "dragoon's teeth"! For this and all other errors we are as sincerely penitent as it is possible for an overdriven beast to be.

IN last week's INQUIRER there was an advertisement of a dance to be held "In connection with the Whit-week meetings of the B. and F.U.A." This advertisement has called forth several letters of serious protest, on the ground that it is unseemly for a series of important religious meetings, at such a season of the Christian year, to end up with a dance, and one correspondent very earnestly asks whether it is too late to dissociate the Association from what he regards as the scandal of this proceeding. As to this, we may at once set our friend's mind at rest. The Association is in no way responsible for the dance, and the advertisers, we believe, had no authority for the heading of their advertisement. The dance is privately arranged by a number of friends, who have simply taken advantage of this week of meetings to provide for those who wish it this pleasant opportunity for another social gathering. If friends may go to the Academy, in the intervals of the meetings, may they not, when the serious meetings are over, quite as naturally and fittingly enjoy a dance?

IN the same week as our Conference meetings at Liverpool, the Baptist Union assembled in London for its annual gatherings. The Baptists to-day are the sturdiest and most vigorous of all the Nonconformist Churches, and their meetings had a note of confidence amply justified by the history of the past few years. Their growth both in numbers and in spiritual power has been remarkable. They have been fortunate in possessing leaders of commanding power, and when we think of Maclaren, Spurgeon and Clifford we no longer wonder at the amazing strides the Union and its churches have taken. But, like the Congregationalists and ourselves, the Baptists have felt that a good deal of their machinery is out of date. A large portion of their meetings was devoted to the reconstitution of the Union on a more representative basis, so as to make it more effectively the organ of the churches. By a slight alteration in the wording of the rules, they have recognised the fact that their churches have a good many Pedo-Baptist members, and that the Independents among them may be sent as representatives to the Union. Is it a prophetic sign of the possible fusion, at no distant date, of these two great denominations?

THE President of the Union for the year is Mr. George White, M.P., who delivered a powerful address on the Nonconformist Conscience, a phrase which, he reminded his hearers, "emanated from the genius which is able to sneer at what it cannot emulate." He quoted in evidence Lord Palmerston, who said, "In this country legislation always follows the conscience of the Nonconformist." As was to be expected, Mr. White's address dealt largely with the education controversy, especially in giving birth to the movement known as "passive resistance." It was, in fact, a modern plea for the sacred right of rebellion on the part of men who are prepared to take the consequences of their action. Mr. White made clear his own attitude on the question amid the enthusiastic cheers of his audience. "In this frivolous age," he said, "it probably does appear incredible to the majority of men that such a stand can be taken. They argue that the amount of the rate may not be larger than before, as if, forsooth, it was the few coppers we grudged. As well might they argue against a gallant regiment fighting for the colours, as though it were the coloured rag floating from the flagstaff for which they were contending." An extraordinary demonstration followed the close of his address, witnessing the determination of the men assembled to follow the lead so boldly given. For our own part the passive resistance movement as an organised policy has never had our adhesion. It is a question for the individual conscience rather than concerted action. Yet we have great sympathy with that large body of earnest men who see here the way of duty and are resolved to tread it. And we are altogether with Mr. White in his contention that it is as morally justifiable to resist the tyranny of a majority as the tyranny of an autocrat. The Education Act has put a strain on the conscience of many which is well nigh intolerable, and we need not wonder at the indignant protests of men like Mr. White and Dr. Clifford.

EMULATING the Congregationalists, the Wesleyans and the Anglicans, the Baptists have built themselves a noble "Church House" in Southampton-row, Holborn, where their various societies will find the housing problem settled for them on an ample and handsome scale. Advantage was taken of the presence of so many visitors to arrange for the formal opening of the new buildings during the week of the Union meetings. One of the most acceptable features of the Church House is the provision made for the convenience of country members when in town, and it is hoped that the fine rooms will become a real home of churches and their members. The opening ceremony, performed by Mr. White, was followed by the unveiling in the Council Chamber of a striking medallion of Robert Hall, given by a grandson of the famous preacher. The good wishes of sister denominations were expressed by Dr. John Brown for the Congregationalists, by Dr. Monro Gibson for the Presbyterians, and by the Rev. C. H. Kelly for the Wesleyans; and although no Unitarian was invited to say a word of brotherly sympathy, we take this opportunity of offering to our Baptist brethren our hearty congratulations on entering their new home, and our sincere desire for the prosperity of their work and their churches.

IN his presidential address to the London Diocesan Conference the Bishop of London spoke at some length upon the case of St. Michael's, Shoreditch, and the various questions arising out of it. In deciding to prosecute Mr. Evans for his teaching and practice in that parish, the Bishop had acted under a stern sense of duty. Such action, in any similar case, he should certainly take again. He had been much encouraged by the fact that the whole diocese was at his back in his resolve to restore law and order. "They saw at once the difference between a use of incense tolerated from the past, on the one hand, and, on the other, devotions to the Virgin Mary, invocation of saints in a public service, the use of the rosary in the pulpit, the Benediction with the reserved sacrament, and the introduction of the modern Roman devotion to the Sacred Heart."

AFTER vindicating his action against an extremist on one wing, Dr. Ingram addressed a strong appeal to extremists on the other wing to co-operate, as far as possible, with their fellow-Churchmen, and above all to abstain from irritating phrases, such as "Mass Vestments." Everyone knew the legal situation with regard to vestments, and every sensible evangelical hoped devoutly that the question would never be raised in Court again, for it was only too likely that in that case they would be declared compulsory. He asked that this question might be left to the discretion of the Bishops. Turning to "the Mass" and "the Confessional," the Bishop laid down clearly the line of his own policy. He would support the Evangelicals in their demand that the rubric should be strictly observed, which enjoins that there must always be communicants besides the priest; but not when they inveigh against a choral celebration at mid-day, with few communicants, in churches where the majority have attended early communion. If by the Confessional was meant a mechanical system to which all must submit, and which is practically made a condition of the sacraments, and the yoke of which is made to triumph over human ties and relationships, he thanked God that they were freed from such a yoke for ever at the Reformation. But Evangelicals ought not to quarrel with those who, with as great a tenderness and sympathy as their own, used what they believed to be the Prayer Book's directions in helping souls to lay down their burden at the foot of the cross.

A RESOLUTION was proposed by the Bishop of Kensington, and supported by the Bishop of Stepney, calling attention to the neglect of public worship in the diocese, and asking the Bishop of London to appoint a committee to inquire into causes and suggest means for removing them. The discussion upon this motion, which was adopted, was discouraging in the extreme. The trouble is one which does not concern the Church of England alone, but all who still value the public worship of God as a means of grace and a radiating centre of healthy life. Every speaker admitted the greatness and reality of the evil. None could find any cause for it beyond the growing indifference to spiritual religion which is always in our mind, as the really important matter, when we speak of this or any other of its symptoms. Nor was any fresh suggestion forthcoming towards a remedy. One Bishop repeated the dictum that a visiting parson meant a well-filled church—"When we know our parson, then we go to his church." Another could put his finger on many churches where the people said, "We know our parson, and we like him well enough, but you cannot ask us to come to his church." Various devices of the "extravagantly resourceful" clergy, which do actually succeed in filling their churches, were condemned as barren of spiritual fruit. "Nothing in the world was so completely abject as the failure of, say, a Pleasant Sunday Afternoon." This suggests the converse reflection that a small congregation of true worshippers may be powerful for good in proportion rather to its sincerity than to its numbers. Yet it would be better to increase those numbers, and the problem of how to do so is at this day before all the churches.

AT a Methodist missionary meeting the other day a speaker remarked: "What a change had come over the employment of women missionaries who were not wives of missionaries. They had a Scripture warrant for that now, for even the Bible had been changed in the last one hundred years. If they looked at Psalm lxviii. 11, they would find that in the old version it read, "The Lord gave the Word: great was the company of those that published it"; but in the revised version it read, "The Lord giveth the Word: the women that publish the tidings are a great host." The same speaker, Dr. Thornton (Camden Town Presbyterian Church), added that in October last fifty-six missionaries left England for the foreign field, and of about fifty of these, part or all the expenses were found by themselves and their friends.

THE sermon preached by the Rev. Charles Hargrove at the recent opening of the new church at Birkenhead is published in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit, with the title, "The Foundations of Religion." The old supports of infallible Church and Book being gone, we must go back, the preacher urges, to something older still, for the foundation on which to build—to the fundamental facts of Human Nature itself, in which Reason and Religion are a twin birth, and awe of the Unseen, and the sense of Dependence and of Obligation, remain amid all changes of knowledge the sure witness to God. On this foundation "The Holy City of God, the Everlasting and Universal Church," is for ever built.

THE April number of the Atlantic Monthly publishes for the first time some letters of Emerson's to the late Herman Grimm (1828-1901), Professor of the History of Art in Berlin University. The letters are prefaced by Mr. F. W. Holls with an account of Herman Grimm, of his friendship with Emerson, and of the manner in which the letters, which are deposited in the Goethe-Schiller Archives at Weimar, were offered by Grimm, just before his death, for publication in America. Three of Grimm's letters to Emerson are also included. Mr. Holls quotes from an essay written in 1861 Grimm's account of how he first made acquaintance with Emerson's writings. He took up a volume of the essays by chance at the house of an American friend, and at first understood nothing; but then with the help of Webster and more careful reading, soon began to feel the unusual power of the writer.

There were real thoughts; there was a real language—a true man whom I had before me. . . . I read the essay entitled Nature, and as I continued, sentence after sentence, I seemed to feel that I had met the simplest and truest man, and that I was listening to him as he was speaking to me.

It was in the spring of 1873 that Grimm first saw Emerson with his daughter Ellen at Florence. "A tall, spare figure, with that innocent smile on his lips which belongs to children and to men of the highest rank. . . . Emerson had unassuming dignity of manner—I seemed to have known him from my youth."

THE letters are of earlier date than the meeting in Florence. In 1867 Grimm wrote to Emerson of his pleasure in welcoming young William James, a student of medicine, to Berlin, and adds:—

To-morrow evening he will become acquainted at our house with Joachim, the celebrated violinist—at the same time my best friend, and also the man who was among the first in Germany to become acquainted with your thoughts in the fulness of their importance. Joachim and I read your works at the time in Germany when besides us perhaps no one knew them. Now, indeed, many know them, and more and more are becoming acquainted with you.

Grimm's letter, it will be seen, is translated from the German original. One quotation we must make from a letter of Emerson's in 1859, acknowledging the gift of some of Grimm's writings, and in particular as essay on Michelangelo.

I give you fair warning that, as I alone in America at this day possess this book of yours, I intend to use my advantage. I advise you to watch me narrowly. I think I shall reproduce you in lectures, poems, essays—whatever I may in these months be called to write. I have already been quoting you a good many times, within a few days, and it was plain nobody knew where I became so suddenly learned and discerning.

I like well what you say, that, when you are at liberty, you will come and see us. After the fine compliments you pay me, I might well think twice of allowing you to undeceive yourself. I shall pay you the higher compliment of entire trust. I shall not run away. You and I shall not fear to meet, or to be silent, or to prize each other's love of letters less, because we can be modest nobodies at home. Come and see our quiet river, and its skiffs, our woods and meadows, in this little town, whose chief contribution to the public good is, that every farmer sends milk and wood to Boston.

The last letter in this correspondence Emerson wrote in December, 1871, telling Grimm of his son Edward's coming to Berlin to study medicine, and acknowledging among other writings of Grimm's a brochure on Schleiermacher.

THE Manchester Guardian has collected and published the opinions of a number of prominent men on the subject of National Physical Training. Sir William Mather considers that military drill is "quite bad for boys up to 15, and abhorrent for girls," but that "Swedish drill is the nearest approximation to the natural lines of development, and manual work should be a part of the curriculum of every school." Mr. Winston Churchill and Mr. John Burns, widely apart as they are on many political questions, are in close agreement in the judgment that the feeding and nurture of the children is the essential matter—that they cannot be trained by physical exercises into strong men and women so long as the conditions under which they live and the food they get are unhealthy, insufficient, and unsuitable. Provide good food and healthy conditions of life, teach temperance in all things, including athletic exercises, smoking and drinking, and the old English pastimes in moderation are sufficient, Mr. Burns says, to develop a strong and hearty race.

Mr. H. F. Trippel, Principal of the Military Training College at Richmond, is in favour of compulsory physical training as part of the daily curriculum of all schools, both primary and secondary, and considers that "a proper division of time between mental and physical education would be three-fifths of it to the former and two-fifths to the latter." A register ought to be kept of the physical condition of each pupil, and development noted in it periodically. Mr. J. H. Yoxall is heartily in favour of making proper physical exercises a part of the teaching "every day in every school," but says that the "model" course issued by the Board of Education at the instance of the War Office, and pressed upon the teachers, is too severe, often very harmful, and utterly inferior to methods which it has often supplanted, such as Swedish drill which successfully aims at a complete development of the whole body and the reduction of inequalities.

A London physician, whose name is not given, discusses physical training in a very suggestive way. While the physique among women of leisure and, to some slight extent, among men of the same class, has improved, there is no perceptible difference in the more highly paid working-classes, while the lower paid factory hands and labourers "show distinct degeneration of type," and the "health rate" of the children of the whole of the working-classes "is unsatisfactory, and the outlook for their future physique very unpromising." "More of our population deteriorate than improve in physique." The main consideration, he indicates, is the conditions under which the children in large towns spend the years of their growth. Fresh air, fresh food (not tinned provisions and milk treated with preservatives), plenty of sunlight and opportunity for healthy romping are needed. They must live away from the crowded areas, or the towns must be given more of country character. The question is one of national hygiene. "In a word," he says, "my cure for the physical degeneracy of the nation is the open-air cure."

In the May number of Sermons for the Day the Rev. R. A. Armstrong has published "Some Conference Notes," the address given to the Hope-street congregation on the Sunday morning following the Conference, and also his address at the Devotional Service on the Friday morning of the Conference. The "Notes" contain the following warning against the dangers of the organisation of churches:—

This earnest appeal for organisation: what are we to feel about it? First of all certainly that it represents a most real and passionate desire among some of our friends—a desire for more sympathy, more effectiveness, more co-operation towards high and sacred ends. And I for one am ready to go along with this desire a very long way. Still I cannot divest my mind of the universal and unbroken history of all ecclesiastical organisations from the beginning of the world to this day. I cannot recall a single instance on the large scale or the small in which they have not developed into organs of suppression or oppression. Of course, in many cases that has been initial purpose and intent. They have openly stood for coercive uniformity and discipline. But there are many other cases where they have had no such purpose at the start, where such intent has been most eagerly disclaimed, where they have been conceived in the express interests of freedom, of protest against spiritual tyranny, pledged to the spirit of liberty and the rights of conscience; yet so irresistible have been the suppressive forces generated by the mere fact of organisation and the opportunities of power which it gives, that presently they have bars to the free play of the human mind and the free life of the spirit. I note that, and I say it is sheer folly not to note it or to treat it as insignificant, as we stand on the threshold of large schemes of organisation intended profoundly to modify the existing relation between our churches.

For my part I am by no means sure that it is not better—in spite of its obvious disadvantages and drawbacks—that we should all be free-lances, we ministers, and that you, the people of our churches, should depend on the spontaneous motions of friendship and comradeship for co-operation rather than any drawing up of constitutions intended by man's device to bring about that which is perhaps best brought about by the free movement of the spirit of our God in our hearts.

There may even be a danger, Mr. Armstrong thinks, in the concentration of various independent funds in one central Board. "There may be a healthy check in independent and varied administration." In conclusion, Mr. Armstrong expresses his unabated faith in "that unorganised Church or fraternity of Churches which we now are," of which he finds that very individualism, which some deprecate and decry, to be the life and strength. And he concludes:—

I am certain that this very intensity of individual personality generates a unity of the spirit, a sympathy and brotherhood deep down in the regions of thoughts and emotions which words are impotent to express, which nothing else could ever bring to birth. I am doubtful whether ever any highly-organised Church held a synod, council or assembly, save in the very moment of its birth or in some crisis of excitement, in which the unspoken sense of brotherhood went so deep as it did with us last week. And I am not sure but that the attempt, by clumsy human hands, to draw the bonds more closely still, instead of leaving it to the silent working of the spirit, might just break the spell, destroy the charm and substitute a struggle for contending views for the unity generated by simple communion of heart and soul.

And so, scattered as we are to-day, perhaps a couple of hundred of our brethren at this very moment trying to tell their home folk about it all in their several pulpits, we are in spirit and in fact, if not in outward organisation, one Free Catholic Church—the name which, best of any ever suggested, describes the true ideal of our Churchmanship; Free, each preacher and each worshipper before God and man to think his thought and speak his word and do his stroke as the divinely given essence of his inmost personality shall constrain him; Catholic, all-embracing in sympathy, by a sentiment going down deeper than all creeds, opinions and intellectual divergencies; a Free Catholic Church with a great and divine mission in these times of compromise and paltering with truth, a great mission entrusted to us by God to strike for sincerity and truthfulness in religion above all else, sincerity and truth brought to bear on the world's sorrows and sins, weaknesses and blind perversities, that so we too may do our part towards bringing the blessed Kingdom of Heaven and God to earth and man.

The concluding sentences of Mr. Armstrong's devotional address, on the Friday morning at the National Conference, we must also quote:—

This spirit of Christ is worth all the rest. And every minister or delegate, or simple unofficial member of our fraternity, will go home cheered and strengthened, encouraged and inspired, lifted up to better and happier things just in the measure, and only in the measure, in which the Christ-spirit has been renewed in him, and he has felt its mystic breathing through our great assemblies or our little groups of two or three. And so, dear brothers and sisters, let us gird our loins joyfully to our battle with sin and darkness and all manner of evil. Let us think of one another often when we are once more scattered to the four corners of the kingdom. I have known these churches of ours long. They have always been faulty, always been hindered by many weaknesses, often been the cause of much disheartenment. But I seem to see in them to-day more of the spirit of love than I ever saw before. Perhaps it is that my sight is clearing. Perhaps it is that my discernment grows dim. But I think that I see more of the spirit of Christ in them than ever before; and I cannot be very unhappy about them. They were the nursery of my childhood, and are the home of my spirit in my manhood, and I dearly love them with all their faults. Let us go forth full of cheer and courage, knowing well how wise was he who said long since, "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

The annual report of the Humanitarian League for 1902, just issued, shows that the activity and influence of the League have been well maintained, especially in the departments dealing with prison reform, cruel sports, and humane diet. Reference is made to the fact that the treadmill—the abolition of which has long been advocated by the Humanitarian League—has finally disappeared from our prisons, and the Committee note with satisfaction that the reduction of the "solitary" or separate system of confinement for prisoners sentenced to penal servitude is no longer looked upon as incompatible with discipline. The annual meeting of the League was held at Essex Hall on April 24.

ALONE WITH THE ALONE.

Ah, yet beyond our thoughts and ways
  Dwelleth the Silent and Alone:
Beyond our harmonies of praise,
  Beyond carved litanies in stone.

He dwelleth holy and apart—
  If haply thou would'st come to Him,
In secret chambers of the heart
  He broodeth with the Cherubim.

LITERATURE.

MR. RIX, formerly secretary of the Royal Society, has long been a most acceptable preacher in many of our pulpits and has made many friends amongst us. These addresses, given to the Croydon Ethical and Religious Fellowship, will be read with much interest for the sake of the writer as well as for the sake of the subject and treatment.

The object which Mr. Rix sets before himself is very difficult and very important. He wants to give a popular and helpful interpretation of reality according to the teaching of modern idealistic philosophy. He wants to show that that philosophy provides a firmer basis and a fuller meaning for religion.

The first lecture simply clears the ground.

The last half-century has robbed us of our religious creed. The old creed was based upon the Bible and the Bible is gone. Never again can Hebrew or Christian Scriptures be used for the basis of a creed. Of them we say now what the Church of England says of the Apocryphal Books. It "doth read them for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine."

Literary criticism and scientific discovery have taken from us our supernatural Bible.

There are no "days of creation," no, not even though one day be reckoned as a thousand years. There is only one day of creation, and that is a day which extends through all eternity.

Mr. Rix is not satisfied that Christian theism as presented by Dr. Martineau can take the place of this Bible religion.

Dr. Martineau "still recognises certain breaks in the natural order, a break between the inorganic and organic, a break between the unconscious and the conscious, a break between the unmoral and the moral." These gulfs, says Mr. Rix, do not exist for us; we do not believe in the breaks, and we cannot, therefore, accept the theism which is needed to explain them. "The faith of the future, whatever it shall be, will have to go beyond even the advanced theology of the Christian Church." The rest of the book is a tentative effort to give a glimpse of the direction in which the new theology will be found. Mr. Rix would be the last to assert that he has provided such a theology. He says: "The theology of the future is not yet; at present we are as sheep having no shepherd." If the work before us had to be judged from the point of view of an adequate and definite theological treatise, the present writer, at any rate, would have to pronounce it completely unsatisfactory.

It can only be fairly judged as a suggestive and tentative effort to sketch in a popular way some of the thoughts of the idealistic school and to invite men once again to bring their reason to bear on ultimate religious problems. Very striking is Mr. Rix's profession of faith in the intellect and his assertion that we cannot have a real religion without a theology.

"Our religion, living though it still may be, is like a mollusc which has lost its shell: it is flabby and feels itself defenceless. Some of us have given up all hope of a creed, in sheer despair, and others of us have talked as if it did not matter. We have insisted that religion is not creed, . . . that religion is a matter of the affections and not a matter of the intellect.

I can almost regret that I ever used that strain. . . . We need to have our thought made clear and firm. In this life of stress, this world of sorrow, this vale of bitter strife and heavy burdens, we shall sometimes—nay, very often—find ourselves in despair or terror if we do not know what to think of God and of this painful world."

We welcome this profession of faith in the intellect, this call to think, this determination to try and understand even the deep things of God, as the most important and characteristic part of the book. Indeed it can hardly be described as a part of the book: it is the spirit of the whole.

Metaphysics has been defined, says Mr. Rix, "as an unusually obstinate effort to think clearly," and it is with metaphysics in this sense that the book is chiefly concerned. We will venture to state the idealistic position in our own way before considering some of Mr. Rix's statements.

To the plain man matter is the ultimate reality. Suns, worlds, rocks, water, wild beasts, and the elements of which they consist, these are real, horribly real sometimes when they hurt or kill us. Our own little self-consciousness is hopelessly feeble in comparison. Space in which matter exists is real also. Before we were born these things were there; after our death they will remain. If the plain man is religious he will add, God made these things, We don't know how or when He made them, but it is clear they express thought and intention; they act according to laws. He made them for our good; He made us for our own. To the religious plain man there are three realities. There is God, Creator of the world and Father of our spirits, in some way present in the world and present with us, but yet distinct from the world and distinct from us. There are our own souls and the souls of all the dead—a hierarchy of spiritual beings. And then in the third place, there is the universe of matter and force, everything that is in any way perceptible or sensible to us; and to the plain religious man as a rule, however firmly he believes in God and the soul, still matter has a reality more clearly marked, more absolutely certain than theirs. "I am absolutely positive about the existence of my body," he says. "I hope and believe I have a soul, but I cannot possibly help being absolutely certain that I have a body." And so again he is inclined to say, "I know this table, those walls, that mountain exist, because I can see and feel them. I hope and believe there is a God, but I cannot, of course, be so absolutely certain as I am that trees, and stones, and seas exist."

If the plain man is irreligious he is likely to maintain that the only permanent realities are matter and force. God is the creation of man's mind; man's mind is the creation of matter. He dwells much on evolution, and describes how man's consciousness seems to have arisen out of what looks like unconsciousness; he dwells much on biology, and points out that the spiritual is absolutely dependent on the material. Now the idealistic school to which the greatest modern philosophers belong is utterly opposed to the plain man in all this. They differ much amongst themselves. Many of them would not admit a separate entity persisting always which could be called the human soul. But they all agree in regarding this so solid-seeming matter which frightens us with its fatal unconscious overwhelming power and permanence as unsubstantial and unreal. Matter, as we think it, does not exist apart from mind. It is mind which is the ultimate reality—our minds, or a universal mind, or both. "Things exist," says Dr. Rashdall, "only in mind or for mind. The idea of matter without mind is an unthinkable absurdity." To the materialist—who is usually a rather unphilosophic personage—the idea of mind without matter is an unthinkable absurdity. Speaking in popular language then, it is along these lines that Mr. Rix's argument proceeds. Thought, not matter, is the ultimate reality.

If by matter you mean, as in their hearts people often do mean, a cold and callous omnipotence, a blind, unreasoning mechanism, despicable yet self-existent, cruel yet irresponsible—then in that sense we are not forced to believe in it. Matter in that sense has no existence. It is not an independent entity, it is a system of spiritual relations, a needful condition of our soul's life, a discipline severe but wholesome.

You say that if you believed this teaching all the reality would be gone from life. I reply that if, indeed, you did believe it, you would find precisely the reverse. It is you who are real: it is love, it is faith, it is beauty that is real. Spirit alone is real; there is no reality in that nightmare by which you are haunted, those prison-bars against which your fevered soul seems to beat her wings.

Mr. Rix treats of the universe, first, as a unity; second, as an organism; and third, as spirit. We cannot in the least follow him when, in his discussion of the universe as organism, he suggests that the universe is in literal truth the body of God.

Whether the systems which are scattered through space like sand upon the shores, and of which our solar system is one; whether these with their deathless and symmetric motions do indeed correspond to the whirl of atoms in a human brain, so that the whole stellar universe is but the physical side of a universal mind; whether this dream of a great thinker be a splendid fancy or the very truth, we cannot tell.

We are inclined to think that in what ought to be a sober rational argument it would be better to leave such "splendid fancies" alone, and this all the more because in the next chapter on the Universe as Spirit, we are made to see that "there is no such thing as matter apart from the mind that perceives it. There is no ultimate reality at all but mind." If so, then what we call physical is really mental after all, and we need not be concerned to prove that God has a body as well as a soul.

There are interesting lectures on Space and Time, on God, on Duty, and on the Future Life. We have room only for one more quotation.

Can God think? Which is more wonderful, myself or that from which I sprang? The man who seriously asks such a question appears to suppose that some inert and utterly lifeless stuff called matter accidentally got set spinning, and when it had spun for a few million years the little grains of which it was made up tumbled by chance into a certain shape called a brain; and when you had got a brain, why then, of course, it began to think. When will people who are haunted by this sort of slovenly superstition get to see that death cannot give birth to life—that if they are alive, Nature must, at any rate, be as much alive as they are—that if they can think, the universe must have powers in that direction, at any rate, not inferior to their own?

* "A Dawning Faith: or, the World as a Spiritual Organism." By Herbert Rix, B.A. Williams and Norgate. 5s.

The quotations which have been given can indicate only a little of the literary and intellectual power of the book. As we have said, the book appears to us very far from being a satisfactory theological treatise. But it may teach the materialist to be less certain that matter is the beginning and end of everything, and it may teach the agnostic to be less uncertain about the possibility of some intellectual knowledge of ultimate truth. These lectures are permeated with the conviction that thought and will are the supreme realities, and that the powers of thought which men possess enable them to come into some intelligible relationship with the divine.

THE "BIBLE-ON-BRICKS" THEORY.*

COLONEL CONDER is an honoured veteran in the service of Biblical Archæology, who among many other things has done a great deal to make our maps of Palestine accurate. So far, he has not been converted to the modern critical explanation of the origins of the Old Testament, and in this volume he attempts to bring up archæological support to the older beliefs. The greater part of his book is concerned with the working out of his "Bible on-Bricks" theory. Starting from the fact established by the Tell Amarna letters that cuneiform writing was spread over Western Asia in the fifteenth century B.C., he argues that the Israelites also would be acquainted with this method of writing, and that they would use it for the preservation of their earliest records. We are therefore to understand that the so-called tables of stone on which the Ten Commandments were written were in reality bricks some six inches square, covered with cuneiform characters. The first edition of Genesis might be contained on about seventy such tablets. The alphabetic method of writing was borrowed from the Phœnicians in the early days of the Monarchy, and the two scripts existed side by side as did the hieroglyphic and hieratic in Egypt. About the time of Hezekiah the cuneiform Hebrew was transliterated into alphabetic. To this process of transliteration, and not to diversity of authorship, are to be assigned those duplicate names such as Yahweh and Elohim, Jethro and Reuel, Ishbaal and Ishbosheth and so on. These are explained to be merely transcriptional accidents, arising out of the varying values possessed by the polyphonous cuneiform characters.

We are afraid that nothing less than the discovery of a few of those cuneiform bricks—we would prefer the couple containing the Ten Commandments—would convert us to this enterprising theory. It is, in fact, an illustration of a phenomenon that may be often observed—namely, that it is rather to the champions of unyielding tradition than to the negative critics that one must resort for daring and desperate conjecture. The references to writing in the literature which Conder ascribes to the pre-alphabetic age present no difficulty whatever to the ordinary opinion that the earliest writing of the Hebrews was alphabetic, and the evidence of the Siloam inscription and the presumption derived from the Moabite stone point the same way. The use of clay tablets as a writing material points no more to cuneiform than to alphabetic characters, and as we have references to their use after the time of Hezekiah, there is no real basis for the suggestion of cuneiform. The weakness of the case appears particularly in the point where most stringent proof is necessary; in reference namely to the existence of two scripts side by side. The only passages which Colonel Conder can offer are the allusion to the pen of a common man in Isaiah, and the reference to the copying out of certain proverbs by the men of Hezekiah. Neither passage requires nor suggests the presence in Israel of two methods of writing.

It is perhaps hardly necessary to remark that in any case Colonel Conder's theory has no apologetic value. The duplicate names which he undertakes to explain by it are only a fragment of the case for composite authorship, and he proves too much when he ascribes the difference between Ishbaal and Ishbosheth to a mechanical accident.

It remains to be added that the interest of Colonel Conder's book is by no means confined to the "Bible-on-Bricks" theory. He discusses, always with a rare gift of clear exposition, a number of points of Old Testament history, and particularly those affected by recent monumental discoveries. Though he takes the conservative side throughout, he writes without any controversial irritation; even though, with malice prepense, he brackets Astruc with Voltaire.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE reviews this month do not appear to have any very striking features. In the Contemporary what we have found most attractive is the address on "Woman Suffrage," by Miss Frances Power Cobbe, delivered last January to a ladies' club at Clifton. Miss Cobbe quotes a saying of George Eliot's, "The masculine mind—what there is of it—is always of a superior order!" She affirms that the attitude of Americans towards women shows a truer appreciation of their just relations than that of Englishmen, and makes out a clear case (as to which we needed no convincing) for the justice of her plea. Mr. Bashford's article on "Sobriety in Germany" shows how grave is the lack of sobriety, and how increasingly the need of reform in the drinking habits of the people of that country is felt.

The Nineteenth Century and After opens with two articles on the Irish Land Bill, the first, by Judge O'Connor Morris, in hot opposition to "A Scheme of Pernicious Agrarian Quackery." Mr. J. Lawson Walton, M.P., writes trenchantly on the crisis in the Church, in reply to Lord Halifax, and the Gresham Lecturer on Astronomy puts in a plea for caution against too great confidence on the subject of the "Canals of Mars." Mr. G. F. Shee, pointing to the lamentable "Deterioration in the National Physique," appears to think that compulsory military service is the only way by which it can be counteracted.

Bacon-Shakespeare bubbles up in two places in the Monthly Review, and Mr. A. R. Hinks, while giving maps of Mars, is doubtful, as the writer on the same subject in the Nineteenth Century, on the subject of the canals, and finds the "Evidence for Life on Mars" by no means decisive. More fully illustrated is Mr. John Ward's article on the "Wonders of the Soudan." Mr. T. Bailey Saunders, the translator of Harnack's "What is Christianity?" &c., contributes a thoughtful article on "History and Dogma," the subject of a recent address to the Churchman's Union. The value of the historical view of dogma is no longer doubted by the thoughtful students of the development of Christianity, but the true bearing of history on this subject Mr. Saunders warns us not to mistake:—

> The history of theology will mislead us if it suggests that the historical is the final point of view, or that, as certain critics seem ready to imagine, when we have explained how any belief arose we have explained that belief away. This is clearly not so where a great idea like that of God's existence is in question, and it is only less so in the case of subordinate ideas. The dogma which is, in a measure, vitiated when its intimate dependence on the intellectual conditions of a given age is made clear, will come by its own again under other conditions, if it has given any expression to the ultimate truths of religion. The husk may be cast aside; but so far as the kernel arises out of and satisfies the perennial needs of the mind and heart, it is a seed that will show its life in favourable soil and develop afresh. The truth that has its roots in our inmost nature can never be destroyed by research, however plainly it may be shown to derive its form and figure from its environment; and that it is able to adapt itself to different environments is the only certain evidence that in our inmost nature its roots are to be found. In this way, then, we attain a view of theology which in some sense places it above the assaults of any historical criticism. Dogmas thus become the embodiment of an immediate spiritual experience; they are justified by their appeal to the individual soul; and so far as the claim is made for them that they follow from historical events, the claim must allow for such events being variously estimated in different ages. Spiritual experience has a method of its own, and between it and history there can be no conflict, because it is one of the facts with which history has always had and will always have to reckon.

Mr. E. V. Lucas furnishes a salutary lesson in his "Song against Speed."

> Of speed the savour and the sting,
> None but the weak deride;
> But ah, the joy of lingering
> About the country side!
> . . . . .
> The turnpike from the car to fling,
> As from a yacht the sea,
> Is doubtless as inspiriting
> As ought on land can be.
> I grant the glory! the romance,
> But look behind the veil—
> Suppose that while the motor pants
> You miss the nightingale!

In the National Review, Sir Godfrey Lushington writes on "The 'Good Shepherd' at Nancy—the English Moral," with a motto prefixed: "He doth ravish the poor, when he getteth him into his net"; and Mr. Arthur Chamberlain has a significant article on "The Birmingham Scheme of Surrender: a Method of Reduction and Appreciation of Licenses without Legislation." The article tells of what Mr. Chamberlain has done since 1896 as Chairman of the Licensing Committee of the City of Birmingham, and urges in conclusion that the subject is difficult and little understood by the public, and therefore not ripe for Parliamentary treatment. Time should be allowed for experiments to be thoroughly tried. And Mr. Chamberlain concludes :—

Nevertheless, the present Parliament being largely controlled by the drink interests, and the Prime Minister being their humble servant, it is possible the cause of temperance will suffer in their hands, and that magisterial powers will be curtailed for a time. If this should happen, temperperance men of all parties should accept the challenge and rearrange their political position. This House of Commons cannot last much longer, and already there are signs of a reaction. If the Liberals, who have plenty of able Parliamentarians but no leader with sufficient imagination to dictate a policy, could only agree on this man, and could accept the settlement in South Africa resulting from the war, and could realise that no party that is a slave to the Irish vote can hope to rule in the House of Commons, and could add to these two conditions sufficient self-control to cease their useless attacks on the character and conduct of the present Colonial Secretary, they might come into power at almost any moment. Then, with a Liberal Government in power, any retrogade legislation now introduced at the behests of the drink interests might be reconsidered, and the status-quo-ante-Balfour restored.

In the World's Work this month we can both see and read about the Port of London and the Greenwich Observatory. Wireless Telegraphy and Cremation are among the subjects dealt with, as are also Cricket and the City of Edinburgh. Among the full-page portraits is one of the Rev. R. J. Campbell, Parker's successor at the City Temple, of whom Mr. James Douglas writes very enthusiastically, if not too wisely. A man of rare spiritual power, in refreshing contrast to his predecessor, Mr. Campbell will make his own way and keep the finer qualities of his influence better without such obtrusive public laudations.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A BINDING MORAL CODE.

Sir,—I write to ask your assistance in correcting or preventing the spread of an impression that I expressed disagreement with Mr. Jacks, which I find was conveyed by some remarks of mine during the discussion on Mr. Street's excellent paper on Friday morning at the Liverpool Conference. I alluded to the address of Mr. Jacks at the large meeting on Thursday night. I listened to that eloquent speech with every feeling of agreement, respect, and reverence, and without any thought of dissent. On Friday morning, however, we were face to face with practical problems of social duty, and I said that if I believed that the extracts from the Bible so beautifully quoted by Mr. Jacks represented the code of my duty, I should not have a good coat on my back, but should be a dock labourer on the high road to a miserable death. I did not, however, accept the Biblical reports either as representing verbatim what Jesus actually said, or as containing any code binding upon my conscience. I appealed to the pastors on the platform and in the hall for guidance, I (without any sarcasm) took the attitude of a sheep asking for a code of morals suited to my nature, which I could deliberately resolve to carry out entirely without conscious dereliction.

I know that I cannot "love my neighbour as myself"; that I intend to resist force with force; that I intend to seek my own advancement in wealth, health, and pleasure; that I only propose to give a moderate percentage of my time, energy, &c., to the good of others, and that I ask no more from others than I am prepared to give in return. So that if in response to my appeal for instruction the pastor tells me to "sell all I have and give it to the poor," I shall not attempt to obey him. I also know that the enormous majority of mankind would act similarly to myself in that regard. I want a code to suit my practice, which I can then use as a weapon to attack the practice of other people when, as I think, it happens to fall below my standard. A code which we (nearly) all deliberately defy in social and national life is no good, the only result of it is a habit of disregarding our code, a habit ruinous and degrading. The pastors should devise a code that they will keep to the letter and the spirit themselves, and make us keep by force of their character and teaching, and this code must be up-to-date and practical in all details. Of course, allowance may be made to them and us for occasional lapses; it is the deliberate, intentional, continued disobedience that degrades.

A CORRECTION.

Sir,—While thanking you for your report of what I said at the business meeting of the Conference, may I say that I spoke of "the Unitarian Association," not of "the B. and F." Though I fear I do lapse into that lazy denominational colloquialism occasionally in the privacy of the domestic hearth, I never should or could make use of it on a public platform. Richard A. Armstrong.

Liverpool, May 4.

Provincial Assembly of Non-Subscribing Ministers and Congregations of London and the South-Eastern Counties.—London, May 1, 1903.—The Rev. Alfred Thompson, who desires to enter the ministry in this province, has satisfied the advisory committee of this Assembly as to his character and personal fitness. Signed, W. Blake Odgers, chairman of committee; James Harwood, hon. secretary. Note.—All matters other than character and personal fitness are left for the sole consideration of each individual congregation.

To this official notice we may add that Mr. Thompson, who was educated at Regent's-park College, has been since 1900 secretary of Cheshunt College, a post which he has now resigned. From the Congregational Year Book we learn that before his appointment at Cheshunt he was secretary for six years of Tettenhall College, a public school in the neighbourhood of Wolverhampton, and that from 1888 to 1891 he was in India, in the service of the London Missionary Society.

OBITUARY.

ABRAHAM FOLLETT OSLER.

In extreme old age Mr. A. Follett Osler, F.R.S., passed away early on the morning of April 26, at his residence, South Bank, Birmingham. Born in March, 1808, at Birmingham, Mr. Osler and his brother, the late Clarkson Osler, were prominently identified with the development of the crystal glass industry, the work of their firm being known all over the world. It was he who designed and constructed the beautiful fountain, exhibited at the 1851 Exhibition, which is now at the Crystal Palace. It is now many years since Mr. Osler retired from business and devoted himself to the scientific pursuits which have been one of the chief and constant interests of his life, but twenty years before his retirement he had devised a self-registering anemometer, in recognition of which he was elected a member of the Royal Society.

Mr. Osler was not a public man in the ordinary acceptation of that term. He shrank from publicity in any form, and although he was frequently asked to enter public life he always declined. But many institutions in the city benefited by his support. He was one of the first governors of the Birmingham and Midland Institute, and to the funds of that institution and to Mason College, and latterly the University, he was a generous contributor. To various philanthropic institutions he was a constant benefactor, but his charity was in keeping with his whole life—it was given quietly and unostentatiously. By the workpeople in the firm he was held in the highest esteem. To this they bore testimony in an address presented to Mr. Osler on his eightieth birthday. "You have been spared through a long and arduous life," they said, "to contribute much to the happiness and well-being of those who have been associated with you, several of whom can count more than fifty years of service in the employment of the firm." His dealings in and out of business were ever characterised by integrity and uprightness, and he has now gone to his rest full of years and honours.

The funeral was on Wednesday, April 29, at the Key Hill Cemetery, a private service for the members of the family being previously held at the house, and on the following Sunday morning the Rev. L. P. Jacks preached a memorial sermon in the Church of the Messiah.

The text was Matt. v. 16, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Having spoken of the witness of a faithful life to the things of God, Mr. Jacks proceeded :—

I have a text to-day other than the words of Christ, and yet one which these words seem to confirm and illustrate. Death coming not unkindly but "serenely arriving"—to use Whitman's beautiful phrase—death, "serenely arriving," has taken from us, in the extreme fulness of his days, the most venerable member of this church. Bound to many of you by ties too sacred to be touched upon by any words of mine, Mr. Follett Osler was bound to all of us not only by the veneration due to his patriarchal age, but by a yet deeper veneration for his strong and noble character. He should be remembered, and will be remembered, as one of the great men — one of the greatest men of Birmingham—and if I say that the fine qualities of his heart and mind make him truly representative of the inner spirit of our religion, our traditions, and our Church, I trust it will not be received as boasting, but as the plain statement of a plain truth. Abraham Follett Osler was a man of might, a man with a great mind, a great heart, and a great will. And if the first thing to be said of him is that he was a strong personality, the second is that his strength was devoted, with a singular and most impressive faithfulness, to the highest ends of human life. In praising the honoured dead it is easy to exaggerate, but who could not say of him with a perfectly honest heart that he was a man of business whose life was consecrated to the pursuit of truth and the good of his fellow-men. The lives of that character are simple, but they are clear and they are sublime. They seem to me to paint for us a new ideal of sainthood, an ideal which men of the world should place before them as not only in strict accord with the deepest wants of the present age, but as attainable by each according to the measure of his capacity.

The saints of to-day must lead, not the contemplative life, but the active, and the scene of their activity is the places where men buy and sell and the great cities where the battle of the race is being fought by the weapons of right dealing, high thinking, and hard working. In the world of commerce the life of one such man as Mr. Osler is a bulwark of defence to all the forces which make for integrity and righteousness. Railers against the present age have said that the commercial life is incompatible with the higher and finer uses of the intellect, or with any deep concern for the things of the spirit. One example is enough to prove the untruth of the saying, and that example is before us to-day. No finer type could be commended to the study and to the emulation of business men. Here is one of their own order, not a man specially advantaged by seclusion from practical affairs, but a busy manufacturer and merchant who finds time and inclination for the eager study of science, who achieves eminence as a scientific man, who enters deep into all social and religious problems, who studies the universe as a philosopher, and takes his part with a kind and liberal hand in the philanthropic work of his time. Few men would think it possible to do one of these things without neglecting the others: but now we see it is possible to do them all.

And may I add that one of the features which shines with the brightest light in the record of this strenuous and many-sided career, is the depth of personal affection in that capacious heart for those who were nearest and dearest, thereby illustrating the law that there is no competition among the things of the spirit, that the intellect is not the rival of the affections, nor the working capacity hostile to the loving, but the more energy the soul puts forth in thinking and labouring, the more it has to spare for the finer offices of the personal tie. If out of so rich and complex a nature it is possible to select one motive, one characteristic, as dominating all the others, I think the one to be named in the case of Mr. Osler was his intense and burning love of truth. To find out what was true, and having found it, to act accordingly, was the leading motive and wish of his life. And it was precisely by this characteristic that the divine shone in the human, that the God spoke in the man. When we think of a life such as this, led on, even to the very last, by an enthusiastic love of truth for truth's sake, inspired and visibly actuated by that love, exalted and quickened by it even among the sorrows and burdens of old age, who can fail to see that some diviner element mingles with our common clay. Verily, his work shines before men, and we, who are the lookers-on, are forced, perhaps in spite of ourselves, to read the meaning of that lustre and to glorify the Father of Lights.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

MORE FIRESIDE FABLES.

XI. Coming Home to Roost.

A rat stole an egg from an owl's nest and sold it to a squirrel, who gave it to his children to play with. The children played with it till they were tired, and then a cuckoo found it, and hid it in a hedge-sparrow's nest. There the egg was hatched, and soon was able to fly, and flew away home. Some time after, the rat went up to steal an egg again, and was killed by the egg he had stolen.

XII. Surmises.

A fawn and a heron stood on opposite sides of a stream, with their heads bent down, and their eyes fixed on the waters between. The fawn was quite sure that the heron was gazing at his own reflection, the heron was equally certain that the fawn was looking for fish, a moor-hen below had no doubt that they were both prying into her nest, whilst a water-rat above was convinced that they were admiring his smooth and glossy coat. Then, when the fawn's shadow moved, and the heron caught his prey, and the moor-hen screamed out, and the water-rat flopped in, they all discovered how mistaken they had been.

XIII. Tirunculus.

Tirunculus, a little boy, began lessons, but never learnt them; began games, but never finished them; began walks, but never got to the end of them. He made a garden, but planted nothing; made a boat, but did not sail it; made a kite, but forgot to fly it. Complaint was made to an ogre, who said, first, that he would make an end of him, then, that he would make a beginning of him—which would be nearly as bad—and from that moment Tirunculus stopped growing, and will never be a man.

XIV. The Bugbear.

A foolish little frog frightened a whole family of field-mice by saying, with open mouth and staring eyes, that an animal with horns, moving without legs, carrying a mountain on its back, and leaving a shining track behind, was coming that way. Whilst they were all squeaking with terror, one, bolder than the rest, ventured to look out, and saw—a snail.

XV. Small Talk.

A swallow on the wing often passed a magpie on her nest, and then the swallow twittered something, and the magpie chattered something in return; but the something on the one side was always the weather, or the scarcity of flies, and the something on the other was always the next wedding, or the latest birth; how this might bring sorrow, how that had made mirth. So it went on through the summer—each becoming more and more tired of the other—though the swallow might have heard something of the forest she had never entered, and the magpie something of the lands she had never seen.

XVI. The Slow Coach.

It started early in the morning. There were very few passengers, but they jogged along pleasantly together, and had time to make friends. They were soon passed by travellers on wheels of all sizes, propelled in various ways, and moving at different rates of speed. The coach rolled on, and the passengers took no heed of the whispers and smiles of those who passed by. They walked up the hills, and sauntered by the hedge-rows, and rested on the banks; now they turned to look back upon the view, and now they stopped to listen to sounds far away, or to gather the things which lay at their feet. Arrived at their journey's end, they found that their fellow-travellers had saved time, only to lose it; had seen very little, because of the dust; and heard next to nothing, because of the noise.

E. P. B.

TO A SICK CHILD.

It might have been that thou and I
  Had lived, sweet child, long, long ago,
Ere yet a sick child's cry
  Proclaimed Pandora's woe.

It might have been those golden days
  Had kept thee for us free from pain:
No sweet though weary gaze
  Had forged love's mystic chain.

It might have been that rosy health
  And all high spirits bade thee sing
And laugh with all the wealth
  Of happiest earth-born thing.

It might have been, and I had joyed
  With frolic eyes to see thee free:
For ever unannoyed—
  No wish ungranted thee.

I know not if our bond had been
  In those gold days, if bond at all,
Like this sweet chain unseen
  That holds me thy dear thrall.

And yet thy pain, grim paradox,
  Upbraids my thraldrom's eager wings!
What subtle key unlocks
  These sweetly bitter things?

I dare not say 'tis better so—
  I dare not wish 'twere otherwise—
Not all Pandora's woe
  Kills Hope in thy sweet eyes.

RENEWED CONSECRATION.

To many of our readers, who have now been back for a fortnight amid the scenes and the stress of their own habitual work, the meetings of the National Conference at Liverpool may have already begun to fade into a somewhat distant, though delightful memory; but it has been our duty to remain amid the throng, and in constant touch with the pulse of life and the deep feelings which animated those great gatherings. Last week, in a double number of THE INQUIRER, we had to complete our full record of the proceedings, and have since been occupied with the task, not yet completed, of seeing a reprint of the report in book-form through the press. Thus we seem still to be in the midst of the Conference, rejoicing in the strong sense of fellowship amid a multitude of friends (though wishing that leisure could have permitted some closer converse with many), enjoying still, with a happy confidence that it could have been no other, the abundant kindness and hospitality of our Liverpool hosts, turning again and again to the quiet hours of devotion, pondering thankfully the many wise and inspiring words that were uttered — marvelling a little, perhaps, at the medley of the business meeting, but assured that the result was good, or at any rate leaves the way open for the working out of good results.

It is difficult, amid so much that claims attention, and stirs to thought and profound emotion, to single out the points on which stress should be chiefly laid; but, attempting now a review of the whole week, there are two things which establish their claim to be said at once, and before all others. The first is as to the direct religious appeal of the Conference, and the second, as to the spirit in which we must grapple with the practical problems of our Church life, set before us with such distinctness and urgency, with faith that there are some better things to be accomplished by our people.

Far above all else we set the direct religious appeal of the Conference, its clear and earnest call to every church in our fellowship, to every member touched by the aspirations of our free religious life, aware or unaware of the duties pressing upon all alike, for renewed consecration. That appeal was made in many forms, in the sermon, in Dr. HUNTER'S searching plea for a "Worshipful Church," in Mr. WOOD'S paper and Mr. DENDY'S speech opening the discussion upon it, and from another side, in the closing benediction of Mr. JUPP'S paper. The spirit of the gatherings in Liverpool will be diffused throughout the country by the silent influence of those who were there and take home with them the new impulse of faith and gladness in the deeper life, and those spoken words are now at the service of us all. Their appeal should be pressed home in every one of the churches. Already the word has been taken up in many pulpits and serious effort should be made, that every printed copy of the papers and the sermon should find many readers and be well pondered, as their message so abundantly deserves.

Neither in the great principle of freedom, vital as that is, nor in identity of belief in matters of doctrine, Mr. CARPENTER declared in his sermon, can we find the secret of true union in the Church. The sources of life are found in the mysteries of trust and prayer, and these are open only to the lowly and loving heart; its strength must be in willing service, in the true spirit of brotherhood. This was further emphasised with great force by Dr. HUNTER. The members of a living Church must be gathered together in self-surrender, with the complete offering of all that is best in prayer and sincere worship, enriching the inward life, and making its outward form beautiful, in lowly and thankful acknowledgment of the Divine presence in the world. And so Mr. WOOD urged that the Church must be above all a channel of divine grace, in which the people are united in true brotherhood of the deeper spiritual life; and Mr. DENDY pressed home the appeal with his reminder that spiritual poverty in the churches is a far graver thing than material poverty, and that they must be wakened to a new sincerity and earnestness in striving after the Christian ideal of life and character. Reverence and devotion, brotherhood, love and service, these are great words. They must be the very life of our churches, and in their perfection the constant aspiration of our souls, if the promise of our religious fellowship is to be fulfilled, and the churches are to maintain their place of honourable service in the world, and by the grace of GOD enter into a larger inheritance. Such was the most urgent appeal of the Conference, towards a faithful answer to which many helpful and quickening words were spoken.

Whatever we may do, or leave undone in the matter of outward organisation, will be an idle beating of the air, unless the impulse of a true devotion is the commanding passion of our common life; but if that spirit of surrender, in the service of brotherly love and reverent seeking to be led in GOD'S way, is with us, true wisdom and strength for the ordering of our outward affairs cannot fail to be given.

This is the second matter which has at once to be seriously considered. The President showed in his address how great during the last twenty-one years, since the establishment of the Conference, had been the capacity of our people for giving, when they clearly saw that good work was to be done, but Mr. WOOD, speaking of "Church Needs," set in what must have been to many a startling light the actual condition of many of the churches. Only a third of the whole number self-supporting, and sixty-nine of the ministers still with less than £150 a year! He made suggestions of the utmost value, for the better husbanding and administration of our resources, for the practical recognition of a common life of brotherhood in our community, by which the strong should be more true helpers of the weak, and united efforts should raise the whole level of our church life, and equip it for more effective service. The President also suggested a plan, by which the churches themselves, realising a common responsibility, and acting through the Conference, as their representative body, might undertake the care of the weaker churches, and leave the British and Foreign Unitarian Association the freer to extend its missionary operations both at home and abroad.

These various suggestions are offered to the churches, and the Committee was directed to take steps to ensure their full consideration. Whether such a Joint Maintenance Board as Mr. WOOD advocates will eventually prove practicable or not, it is quite clear that there is great need for some such means of co-ordinating and concentrating our efforts; but above all, in whatever deliberations and negotiations may ensue, it is earnestly to be hoped that the one great aim may never be lost sight of, to realise more deeply the common life of our churches, and their responsibility for their own work. In a genuine spirit of brotherhood we must set ourselves to think out these problems of church fellowship, and missionary effort, willing to give up personal preferences for the common good, only seeing that we do nothing contrary to what the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in a sermon quoted in another column, truly describes as our ideal of a Free Catholic Church.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday afternoon, April 28, the President, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., in the chair; and there were also present the Rev. F. Allen, Miss Burkitt, Mr. E. Capleton, Mr. Edwin Clephan, the Rev. George Carter, Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, the Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., Mr. Charles Harding, the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., Mr. A. S. Harris, Miss Helen Brooke Herford, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Miss Florence Hill, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mrs. W. G. Mace, Mr. David Martineau, the Rev. Philemon Moore, B.A., Mrs. Francis Morton, Mr. C. F. Pearson, the Rev. H. Woods Perris, Mr. J. G. Pinnock, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mrs. Henry Rutt, Miss Emily Sharpe, Mr. W. Spiller, the Rev. F. W. Stanley, Mr. Hugh Stannus, Miss Tagart, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. Arthur Titford, Sir R. K. Wilson, Bart., Mr. T. Pallister Young, and the Secretary.

The minutes of the last meeting of the Council, Oct. 28, 1902, having been read and confirmed, the Secretary read the Report of the Executive Committee, as follows:—

REPORT.

Since the Council met in October last, the Committee have held six meetings, and there have been thirty meetings of the various sub-committees. The work of the Association is increasing in a great many directions, and the opportunities for further work are apparently without limit.

Happily, owing to the splendid generosity of a friend of the President, who offered £1,000 a year provided £2,000 additional was raised, the Committee were encouraged to prepare a scheme of new and enlarged work at home and abroad more enterprising than anything which had been attempted before. The response to the appeal exceeded all expectations. In the course of a few weeks the whole amount asked for was subscribed. The Committee are most grateful to the anonymous subscriber, and to all those who by large and small subscriptions have shown their confidence in the Association and their interest in its work. The additional income of £3,000 is assured for at least a few years; and there are warm and steadfast friends of the Association who will doubtless come forward and take the places left vacant by subscribers whose death the Committee so frequently have to lament.

Not only has the income been secured, but much of the new and enlarged work is already well in hand. The Committee are in communication with wise and judicious counsellors respecting the Foreign work which is contemplated, and definite announcements in respect to this will soon be made. The Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter, Charles Hargrove, and R. A. Armstrong have undertaken to deliver valuable courses of lectures addressed to people who take a thoughtful interest in religious questions, The Revs. S. H. Mellone. E. W. Lummis and W. J. Jupp and the President have promised each to prepare a volume in a new series of Handbooks of Religion. The Revs. John Page Hopps, James C. Street, and Joseph Wood have responded to the invitation of the Committee to assist in the conduct of religious services for the people in large centres of population. Several able and experienced ministers have pledged themselves to visit the more isolated congregations, and to preach and lecture as occasion may offer. Other branches of new work are at present receiving careful attention from the Committee.

Finance.—Full particulars of the income and expenditure during 1902 will appear in the Annual Report now in preparation. The ordinary income of the Association for the three months ending March 31, 1903, amounted to £1,483. The expenditure was practically the same as in the previous year. The collections taken on behalf of the funds of the Association in Nov., 1902, were the largest on record. No less that 216 congregations made collections, and the amount received was £613. The Committee acknowledge with gratitude this striking testimony of wide-spread appreciation, and of confidence in the liberal policy pursued by the Association. It is to be hoped that the few well-to-do congregations whose names are absent from the list will soon join in this common expression of practical sympathy with Unitarian missionary work at home and abroad. By keeping the missionary spirit alive in our congregations they will best keep themselves alive. It has been decided to add to the number of local treasurers of the Association, so that in every centre where there is a congregation of Unitarians the Association may have a capable and, if possible, an enthusiastic representative. Members of the Council might assist the Committee in extending a knowledge of the Association in their respective localities.

Publications.—With the view of securing a larger and wider circulation, arrangements were made with Messrs. Longmans and Co. to publish the volume of lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. Unitarian ministers were given the opportunity of each procuring a copy at half price, if ordered and paid for before the date of publication. The five addresses on "Types of Religious Experience," delivered at the Whit-week meetings last year, have been issued in an attractive volume. "The Essex Hall Year-Book" for 1903, with various improvements, in addition to the usual corrections, has been issued, and it continues to fill a useful place in our church life and work. The revised and enlarged edition of "The Essex Hall Hymnal" has proved so successful that a second impression has been printed, and upwards of thirty congregations have already adopted it. The contents, type, binding, and price of the Hymnal have given general satisfaction. An English edition of the new "Life of Dr. Channing," by the Rev. J. W. Chadwick, will be published shortly at Essex Hall. Negotiations are in progress for the preparation of a "Life of Dr. Priestley," to be issued next year in celebration of the centenary of his death. The centenary of the birth of Dr. Martineau in 1905 has not been forgotten, and the members of the Council will be glad to learn that the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter has undertaken to prepare a biography of the great preacher and thinker, similar in size to Mr. Chadwick's "Life of Dr. Channing." The centenary of the birth of Emerson falls on May 25, and in addition to the Essex Hall lecture by Mr. Augustine Birrell, the "Divinity School Address" will be published in an attractive book. The Committee have also in the press a small volume by Mr. Thomas J. Hardy, an ex-clergyman of the Anglican Church, entitled "Chart and Voyage," in which he deals with the dangers and temptations of intellectual insincerity in theology and religion. Several new pamphlets have been published, including one on the doctrine of the Atonement by the Rev. John Page Hopps, with a commendation by Archdeacon Wilberforce. "Footprints of the Creator," a tract by the Rev. J. E. Manning, will be found very useful. There have been reprints of Unitarian leaflets and Tracts by the Revs. Stopford A. Brooke, James Freeman Clarke, Brooke Herford and Frank Walters.

From Oct. 1, 1902, to March 31, 1903, 1,544 books, valued at £99 17s. 1d., and 59,059 pamphlets, valued at £147 12s. 11d., have been granted to ministers, congregations, postal missions, and private inquirers. Of late, a great many "orthodox" ministers have applied for grants of Unitarian publications, and the Committee are always ready to assist in enlightening earnest and serious men respecting our principles and faith.

Missionary Work.—The Committee have not yet observed any reluctance on the part of congregations in need of assistance to ask or receive aid from the Unitarian Association; and what is perhaps still more important, the Committee have had no complaints of their having sought to impose theological or ecclesiastical tests upon the recipients of the Association's grants. The following congregations have had grants voted to them, usually towards the salary of their ministers, and subject to the congregations themselves raising certain sums:—Aberdare (Highland-place), £12; Ashton, £80; Bedfield, £30; Boston, £20; Bournemouth, £25; Bradford (Manchester), £35; Bridgend, £50; Carlisle, £45; Chopping-ton, £15; Chorlton-cum-Hardy, £30; Clydach Vale, £15; Colyton, £10; Congleton, £20; Crewkerne, £25; Darlington, £50; Deal, £5; Denton, £40; Devonport, £50; Framlingham, £20; Gateshead, £50; Hastings, £35; Heaton Moor, £35; Huddersfield, £35; Leicester (F. C. C.), £20; London:—Bermondsey, £20; Forest Gate, £48; Kentish Town, £60; Kilburn, £5; Lewisham, £60; Mansford-street, £15; Plumstead, £60; Stepney, £15. Loughborough, £20; Lydgate, £10; Macclesfield, £30; Malton, £10; Middlesbrough, £30; Mottram, £20; Newark, £18; Newbury, £15; Newton Abbot, £10; Nottage, £15; Nottingham (Christ Church), £25; Pentre, £17 10s.; Plymouth, £15; Poole, £30; Small Heath, £50; South Shields, £10; Stockton, £10; Stratford-on-Avon, £50; Sychbant, £5; Torquay, £30; Urmston, £35; Walsall, £10; Walthamstow, £10; Whitchurch, £15; Wick, £5; Wolverhampton, £80; Yarmouth, £20; Yeovil, £25. In making grants to congregations the Committee endeavour to act in co-operation with the local associations, and with the managers of the Sustentation Fund, so that, as far as possible, adequate help may be provided, and over-lapping and pauperising avoided.

The ministers-at-large of the following societies are supported by the Association:—London and South Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly, £100; North Midland Association, £100; Western Union, £72 10s. Formerly assistance was given to the Manchester District Association, the Midland Union, the Northumberland and Durham Association, and the South East Wales Society, but ministers-at-large are no longer employed by these organisations.

In addition to what may be called grants for maintenance, special grants for the improvements of buildings, for lectures, missionary visits, and other purposes, have been made, including Gellionen and Trebanos, £50; Ipswich, 25; and Shrewsbury, £30. Visits to congregations in different parts of the country have been paid by the Rev. James Harwood, whose services have been highly appreciated. The Rev. James C. Street conducted a most helpful series of services in the district covered by the Southern Unitarian Association, when he preached or lectured at Bournemouth, Parkstone, Poole, Portsmouth, Ringwood, and Wareham. The Rev. John Page Hopps lectured at Brighton; aid was also given towards the expenses of a course of lectures by the Rev. H. V. Mills on "Religion and Evolution." Very special mention must be made of the lectures on the Bible by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, at Bristol, Leicester, Manchester, and Swansea, and afterwards at Kensington. Six week-night lectures were delivered at each place, and they were attended by large and deeply interested audiences. The Committee are persuaded that in arranging for such courses of lectures they are performing an important and useful service to the cause of liberal religious thought; and they are sure the council will join in gratefully acknowledging the zealous labours of Mr. Carpenter, and the willing co-operation of the ministers and congregations in making the local arrangements in the respective towns where the lectures were delivered.

The grants for the spread of our Unitarian word and work in foreign lands made in previous years have again been repeated; but with the additional resources placed at the disposal of the Committee there will be new developments demanding much increased aid. The congregations at Auckland, Brussels, Budapest, and Melbourne, receive assistance, and the missionary work performed by the printed page in Denmark has been aided by a grant.

Mr. Z. Toyosaki, the Japanese student at Manchester College, Oxford, completes his studies in June, and, after attending the meetings of the International Council at Amsterdam, he will return to his own country, carrying with him the respect and good wishes of a large circle of friends in this country. The Committee hope that another student from Japan will shortly be selected to take his place. Unitarians of Japan are in close sympathy with the Unitarians of America to whom they owe so much; the scholarship at Oxford will, it is hoped, help to link the Unitarians of England in a common friendship and sympathy.

The meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other liberal religious thinkers and workers at Amsterdam arranged for the first week in September are already being looked forward to with great interest. Men of high position and learning in different countries have intimated their intention of taking part in the proceedings. The liberal religious thinkers and workers of Holland are making every effort to render the gatherings memorable. It is gratifying to know that Mr. Ion Pritchard has already heard from upwards of sixty persons who desire to attend the meetings from this country. There ought to be a representation of at least one hundred Unitarians from the British Isles, especially as the travelling expenses are so very moderate. The Association will doubtless receive a fresh impetus in its foreign work at Amsterdam, when it will be officially represented by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, J. Estlin Carpenter, James Harwood, P. H. Wicksteed, Mr. Ion Pritchard, and the Secretary.

McQuaker Trust.—The following Unitarian churches in Scotland have had grants made to them for the current year in aid of the ministers' salaries:—Aberdeen, £95; Dundee, £85; Glasgow (South St. Mungo-street), £90; Kilmarnock, £100; Kirkcaldy, £100. The congregation at Aberdeen hope before long to begin building a church on the new site which has now been purchased; the congregation at Kirkcaldy are again without a minister, the Rev. G. A. Ferguson having resigned. On the initiative of the Scottish Unitarian Association, aided by the McQuaker Trust, special services and lectures were arranged at Aberdeen, Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow (South St. Mungo-street) and Kirkcaldy, when the respective ministers exchanged pulpits; the reports received from the various churches speak warmly of the interest and helpfulness of this interchange of pulpits. Mr. John Ewart, M.A., McQuaker student at Manchester College, Oxford, completes his course in June, but as he applied for and obtained a Hibbert scholarship to enable him to study abroad, he will not be in a position to accept an appointment in Scotland for another year. Large numbers of Unitarian books, pamphlets, and other literature have been circulated in Scotland through the churches and in other ways; the Postal Mission work is for the present under the care of Mr. Irvine Innes, of Kilmarnock.

Indian Fund.—After June 30 the Indian Fund will be merged in the general funds of the Association, and the present subscribers will be invited to continue their subscriptions on the understanding that work in India will be carried on under the direction of the Committee as part (and an important part) of their foreign work. The mission stations in the Khasi Hills remain in much the same position as before; good work is being done by the various teachers and preachers, who are supported from a grant of £100 a year paid by the Association. Mr. Akbar Masih will receive £20 for the current year in aid of his literary and other missionary work. A grant of £15 has been voted towards the expenses of a course of lectures and sermons by Mr. B. C. Pal, to be organised by the Southern Indian Somaj in the Madras Presidency. The Committee will cease to have any further responsibility in regard to the Unitarian chapel at Madras in June next. Professor R. Chatterjee, of Allahabad, has organised a postal mission for the circulation of books and pamphlets explanatory of liberal religious thought, and thousands of publications have been circulated by him, in response to requests from University graduates and others in the North-West Provinces of India. Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., completes his two years' course at Manchester College, Oxford, in June, and he will soon afterwards return to India, carrying with him the good wishes of the Committee, the college professors and his fellow students. The joint committee of the Brahmo Somajes at Calcutta recommended Mr. Vasudev Anant Sukhtankar, of Poona, as successor to Mr. Shinde, and the scholarship of £100 a year will be awarded to him when he takes up his residence at Oxford in October next. The Committee of Manchester College have agreed to admit him as a special student free to lectures and classes. During the last few years Mr. Sukhtankar has been actively engaged in spreading a knowledge of liberal religious thought in the Bombay Presidency.

Deputations.—The Committee are always glad to send a representative to attend the annual meetings of district associations, and other important gatherings in different parts of the country, especially when the invitations reach them some time in advance. The Rev. James Harwood attended the meetings of the Eastern Union at Norwich; Mr. Oswald Nettlefold was present at the large and enthusiastic meetings of the Manchester District Association; Mr. Richard Robinson represented the Committee at the annual meetings of the East Cheshire Union at Macclesfield; and the secretary attended the important meetings of the eighth Triennial Conference at Liverpool. The opportunities for the interchange of ideas, for extended knowledge of the work that is going on, or waiting to be done, and, above all, the opportunities for friendly intercourse afforded by such gatherings, are invaluable.

Questions being invited on the report, Miss Emily Sharpe asked whether more could not be done to help congregations that were without ministers. The Rev. J. Harwood, referring to the discussion at the Liverpool Conference, repeated the statement of the secretary of a Lancashire congregation made to him on the following Sunday, that no correspondence he had was at once so businesslike and practical, or so kindly and helpful, as that with the Unitarian Association. With reference to the International meetings at Amsterdam in September, Mr. Ion Pritchard said that he should be in that city at the end of June, and after that would have more particulars as to hotels, &c., but that so far as he could now tell, the cost there and back second-class, by Flushing, would be 25s., and board and lodging about 10s. a day, and the membership ticket 4s. 2d. Thus the whole cost for a four days' visit would be about £3 10s. Mr. Pritchard also reported that he had just received from Calcutta a full report of the use to which the Famine Relief Fund of £2,600 had been put, which he had been instrumental in sending out to their brethren of the Brahmo Somaj in 1900. Over 1,000 people had been fed during the time of famine by means of the fund, and many had been clothed, and orphans cared for. Agents had gone from place to place, administering relief at the risk of their lives, for there was plague as well as famine in the land. The report was accompanied by expressions of sincerest gratitude to all the subscribers from the Brahmo Somaj Committee on behalf of the Theists of India, and those who had been saved in that time of famine.

The President, in moving the adoption of the report, said that he did so with great satisfaction. It seemed to him a splendid report of great and beneficent work. He had to offer an apology that through illness he was not able to be present at the last meeting of the Council, and he took that opportunity of expressing his gratitude for his appointment as President, and his admiration for the work of the Association. At the present moment the Association found itself in a position of unprecedented strength, with resources surpassing any it had hitherto possessed, and opportunities greater than ever before. Unfortunately they could not personally thank the generous friend who had initiated the great movement towards increasing the funds of the Association. There were those, he believed, who exercised themselves in conjectures as to his identity, but those conjectures, so far as they had come to his ears, had been singularly fallacious, and he ventured to suggest that they should all refrain from the somewhat ungracious attempt to pierce the veil of anonymity, and discover the secret which the donor had, he believed, revealed to one other person only besides himself, and which he was pledged to guard with vigilance.

The vistas of work opening out before them at home and abroad were really amazing, and already the Committee had become aware that they could usefully employ funds very much larger than hitherto placed at their dispoal. So though the £3,000 had now been raised, they should not be deterred from adding to that amount. Indeed, it was not want of opportunity, but want of men for missionary and educational effort, that would set the only limit to the area of their operations.

During the past week many of them had enjoyed in Liverpool a time of spiritual and intellectual refreshment. At that meeting of the National Conference it seemed to him that there was a new baptism of the spirit; the bonds of unity, not necessarily unity of precise opinion or policy, but of mind and heart, were drawn closer than perhaps they had been for a generation or more amongst them. One opportunity he had specially valued—namely, the opportunity to remove, he hoped for ever, the false and mischievous impression that there was a Unitarian Association party as against a Conference party, or that the active spirits in that Association had, or could have, any but the heartiest sympathy with every movement tending to increase the value of the Conference in their common religious life.

With regard to the financial help of their churches, he had ventured last week to express the conviction that they would be only too delighted if any body of persons or institution were able to come before them stating that they were in a position to take the responsibility off their shoulders of finding funds for impecunious congregations, thus setting their funds free for the purely educational and missionary work crying aloud to be done. For the present, however, it did not appear that they were likely to be thus relieved, and they could not leave the churches they had hitherto succoured crying out for aid. They must still go on meeting as best they could those appeals till some other persons were ready to relieve them from the burden. Any change, if any was to come about, amongst their churches, must take a considerable time to arrange and carry into effect. Perhaps it might ultimately prove that their people, their great and rich donors and the commonalty also, would not be determined so much by theoretical considerations as by the desire to place their benefactions in the hands of that committee which should show itself most conspicuous for business capacity and administrative ability. The average Unitarian layman was a man of abundant common-sense, but not specially remarkable for the gift of theoretical imagination. It was well that they should educate him so far as they could, and teach him to understand the scruples some of their friends had with regard to the particular channel through which funds should flow. But his experience was that it was rather tough work.

In Liverpool for sixty years the three greatest Unitarian divines of the nineteenth century gave all their force and all their gifts to the exposition of the theory that there should be no organic connection between a Unitarian association based on a theological doctrine and the free life of their churches. Yet he had to confess, with whatever regret, that he could not at that instant recall any Liverpool laymen now active in their churches who had thoroughly grasped the question at issue, or many who were even aware that there was any question to grasp; and for his own part he was more and more inclined to drop those theoretical considerations and go for the practical system which would best relieve and brighten and strengthen the churches in which they all alike had so deep and profound an interest. As for the executive of that Association, they only desired to see the available resources applied with the utmost efficiency and advantage to the churches, and would welcome any plan that would conduce to that.

They were on the eve of their own anniversary meetings. The experience of previous Conference years showed that those meetings did not suffer from the earlier gatherings, but rather that the desire for meeting together was stimulated, and he therefore looked forward with great hope to a very happy and successful series of meetings. They would begin with one of the brightest literary men of the day speaking on the choicest spirit born on the far side of the Atlantic; and they would also have cause to remember that they were associated with an international movement, for though they could not convene the splendid platform of two years ago, they would hear the voices of America, Germany, Denmark, Belgium, India, and Japan. He looked forward to those meetings confident that they would be inspired by the same spirit of fraternity, the same sense of deep brotherly sympathy, even when they differed on small points of policy, which was so marked in the great gatherings in Liverpool in the previous week.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant seconded the motion, and took the opportunity of expressing the great pleasure with which they welcomed the President there, restored to health, and their delight and gratitude that through him so great a help had been given to the work of the Association.

The report having been adopted, the Secretary announced particulars as to the meetings in Whit-week, and also noted the changes to be made in the list of members of the Council. A resolution as to this and the nominations for committee and officers was passed on the motion of the President, seconded by the Rev. Philemon Moore.

The Rev. Charles Hargrove had given notice of the following notion, but was not present to move it.

That the Executive Committee be asked to consider and report on the following resolutions:—

(a) That grants may be made to such congregations as are maintained without a minister in such a manner as satisfies the Committee that the work is fairly successful; but that such grants shall only be for special purposes and not for ordinary maintenance.

(b) That in the list of ministers in the "Year Book," there shall be appended to the name of each minister the list of Churches at which he has from time to time served, as in Crockford's "Clerical Directory."

In his absence (a) was moved by Mr. Capleton and seconded by Miss Sharpe, Messrs. Pearson, Tayler, and Stannus, and the Revs. P. Moore and H. W. Perris joining in the discussion, and the resolution was passed.

(b) Was also passed, on the motion of the Rev. H. W. Perris, seconded by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

Miss Tagart, in an interesting address, then called attention to the spread of Unitarian thought on the West Coast of Africa, both among the negroes and the white settlers. The Postal Mission had received several letters from that part of the world. The correspondence began with a negro who was studying medicine at Edinburgh, and on his return to his own country had been active in the distribution of Unitarian literature. Several Europeans of position at Lagos had proved themselves grateful for such literature, and latterly a still more interesting and intimate correspondence had been carried on with Mr. J. O. George, of Lagos, a native worker, who had been actively engaged in the Wesleyan Mission, but was dissatisfied with the orthodox presentment of Christianity. The Yoruba country, north of Lagos, is fertile and thickly populated by an intelligent race of negroes, and through the instrumentality of Booker Washington, of the Tuskegee Institute, negro farmers have come over from America, model farms for cotton (which is indigenous in the country) and other produce have been established, and a cotton industry is being fostered. It appears that among these people orthodox Christianity is felt to be alien, and has proved ineffective, while Mohammedanism has made much more rapid progress. The knowledge of Arabic has become general, and the Koran is held in high reverence. It is the Germans who have chiefly promoted the new industry, and what is needed, Miss Tagart said, is pioneer education, and the real Christian religion, not guns and punitive expeditions, not a Christianity of formulæ and alien ceremonial, but a purer morality, with discriminating justice, mercy, and love. The converts to Mohammedanism are at once made to feel the dignity of their manhood, their equality before God. Their native belief in God is honoured, and their aspirations turned from what is bad and cruel in their old conceptions of religion to a purer monotheism. There appears to be a great opportunity for the higher ideal of Christianity, if only it is presented in a simpler, more natural form, with more regard for native habits and sentiments, for their language and love of their own music, and above all with great sincerity and consistency in the conduct of professing Christians. Miss Tagart quoted from a pamphlet by Mr. George, on the Yoruba country, published at Lagos in 1895, and also from a recent book on the "Affairs of West Africa," by E. D. Morel, a member of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, giving a striking instance of Mohammedan devotion and earnestness in propagandist effort, and pleaded that native teachers should be encouraged in the use of Unitarian literature, which could not fail to be of great service in that country.

The President said that they were much indebted to Miss Tagart for her address, and mentioned that the Liverpool Postal Mission had also had correspondence with that country, which bore out what she had said.

The meeting then terminated.

NATIVE LABOUR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

On Wednesday, April 29, a meeting was held in Caxton Hall, Westminster, under the auspices of the Aborigines Protection Society and the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. The Right Hon. Sir John E. Gorst, M.P., who presided, said the meeting was called, not for the purpose of attacking the British or Transvaal Governments, but in order to strengthen their hands by a clear enunciation of those principles with regard to the question of slavery which had so long been maintained by the Government, and for which we had in the past made so many sacrifices. The doctrine that it was the duty of the civilised States to induce natives to be industrious was a perfectly sound one, but it was not a doctrine that should be pushed too far. It should have two limitations: (1) That the industries to which they were put should be useful and beneficial to the natives. (2) That our inducement to them should not develop into compulsion. The doctrine was not a new one, for it had been adopted by Spain in her colonies, and slavery of the worst kind was developed; the natives were practically exterminated. The number of natives in the Transvaal was not enough to meet the demands of labour for the mines, and, in a recent despatch, Lord Milner supported that view. It was computed that at present there were in the Transvaal 80,000 native labourers; but their labour was required for other work besides developing gold mines. Many were occupied in cultivating their own lands, others were on British farms. The army of occupation and the police created a great demand for native labour in looking after their wants, while the repatriation of the country, repairing the damages of the war to the railways, bridges, roads, telegraphs, &c., public works, and new industries needed much native assistance. The High Commissioner (Sir Godfrey Langden) had pointed out that there were now as many, if not more, native labourers working in the Transvaal—though not in the gold mines—than there were before the war. There was, therefore, no ground for saying that the natives of the Transvaal were idle. The most urgent danger was that natives might be brought into the Transvaal from other parts of Africa. This shifting of the coloured races from one part of the world to another was a most serious danger, owing to the possible development of slavery. Nothing showed more clearly how important it was to a country not to rashly divest itself of its native labour than the action of the Natal Government. Natal had passed a law prohibiting the recruiting agents from sending native labourers beyond the colony. This might with great advantage be imitated elsewhere. If the gold was not extracted for twenty years it would still be there to be got out in the future, whilst if they divested land of its labourers the land went to waste instead of producing cotton, sugar, and other necessaries.

Sir THOMAS FOWELL BUXTON, as President of the Anti-Slavery Society, made it clear that in no sense was the movement animated by party spirit. They desired that all industries should flourish and prosper—mining as well as agriculture. They had to regard not so much what the Government had done as what certain people had demanded that they should do. They should see that men who did not want to work in the mines should not be forced to do so.

Lord OVERTOUN pleaded on behalf of the natives of Nyassaland that they should not be enticed to the South. Labourers were even now becoming scarcer, and the development of the country would be greatly delayed if recruiting were permitted there.

Mr. W. CROOKS, M.P., denounced the attempt to introduce slavery—calling it something else—under the British Flag. The cultivation of the land must be of more importance to the Empire than any number of diamonds or ounces of gold, and if they could not be got out of the ground without departing from the cherished principles of British rule let them stop in. Was all the glorious work of the missionaries to be put back for the sake of Park-lane?

Sir Henry Cotten, Sir W. Brampton Gurdon, M.P., Messrs. E. Wright, Brooks, Quinlan, Tobias, and Thomas Bayley, M.P., also spoke.

MEN are then least in their own eyes when God is most in their eyes.

IN THE ACADEMY.

BY far the most interesting thing in this year's Academy is, to our mind, Mr. Dollman's picture of "Mowgli made leader of the Bandar-log," from Kipling's inimitable Jungle-Book (773). There is the deserted Indian city, of which the swarms of the Monkey-People have taken possession, and in the midst the swarthy boy with his far-away look, whom they have just carried off from Baloo and Bagheera, and mean to make their leader. Heedless of the impending tragedy, the monkeys are sitting round in solemn council, and they are really worth looking at. That is more than can be said, from any but perhaps the milliner's point of view, of a large number of obtrusive portraits of wealthy ladies, with absolutely uninteresting faces, and some preposterous dresses, which fill a large amount of space in this collection. The sight of them is curiously depressing, when one is looking for something beautiful, and then a shock of absurdity intervenes when one comes upon Mr. Arthur Hacker's "Leaf Drift" (292). What are those women doing out there in the autumn wood, and what have they done with their clothes? This is one of a considerable number of pictures which offer a great opportunity for Punch.

Landscapes there are which one can linger over with untiring pleasure, and a wise observer pleads in mitigation of our impatience, that there are a good many pictures which the children will enjoy, whether well or poorly painted, pictures with dogs and other animals in them, and bits of unaffected human nature; but we have not found one picture in the whole Academy of which we can speak as really notable.

The President's chief picture this year, "The Cave of the Storm Nymphs" (160) is doubtless painted with masterly skill, but it is not a pleasant or inspiring subject. On the opposite wall, in the same room, is a little bit of Sir Alma Tadema's exquisite white marble and the blue Mediterranean, "Silver Favourites" (203), with their usual accompaniment of idle Grecian women, and there is also one Watts, "A Parasite" (153), the trunk of a tree closely enwrapt with ivy, but that greatest and most venerable of our artists has again adhered to his custom of recent years, and has sent more of his pictures to the New Gallery than to the Academy. Among the more interesting of the portraits are Sir H. Weber, M.D. (163), and Major-General Baden-Powell (491), both by Herkomer, and the Rev. N. Loraine (186), who is fortunate to have been painted with his lurcher "Sirdar," by Briton Riviere. The familiar face and splendid uniform of the German Emperor (90) have been painted by Mr. J. W. Nicol for the United Service Club.

At the end of the Third Gallery, where a Royal portrait or some piece of state pageantry has of recent years generally been hung, there is this year nothing of the kind, but a landscape, "Mountain Majesty," for a change (142), by Mr. H. W. Adams, a splendid mass of mountains, height upon height, snow-clad on the upper ridges. Another less majestic but fine bit of mountain scenery is Mr. Crossland's "Tilberthwaite, Coniston" (9); different again is MacWhirter's "Rugged Hills of Skye" (157). We have found special pleasure this year in the great variety of studies of water, from the placid light over the "Old Monmouth Canal" (24), by E. Davies, and the stillness of the mere in David Farquharson's "Winter" (736), to Julius Olsson's "White Squall" (424) and the green, foam-flecked rollers of W. T. Richards' "After a Gale" (428). One of the most striking of these studies is of the deep waters of the "Incoming Tide" under the cliffs, by Lucy Kemp-Welch (356).

MacWhirter has painted many silver-birches, but hardly one more exquisite in its grace, and the freedom with which it stands out in the clear atmosphere than this year's "White Queen: Strathspey" (20). Close by is Leader's happiest picture in this collection, a charming view over the distant plain, "Southward from Surrey's Pleasant Hills" (12). For a last bit of landscape we cannot do better than linger among the "Apple Blossom: Upper Wye" (74), by H. W. B. Davis.

We have looked in vain through the rooms this year for pictures by a number of familiar friends. That they have not painted far better pictures than many which jostle one another in the strange medley, we will not believe—but fortune has been against them. Mr. Savage Cooper, however, has secured two places, "Hands Lily-white, &c." (581) and "Childhood's Sunny Days" (787). In the Black-and-White Room Mr. Edmund New exhibits four of his illustrations of Alfred Austin's "Haunts of Ancient Peace" (1,432).

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting in connection with this Association was held on the evening of 27th ult. in the Central Hall, Belfast, when there was a numerous attendence of members and friends. After tea, the Rev. JAMES KENNEDY presided, and amongst those present were Principal Gordon (Manchester) and the Rev. Edgar Daplyn (London), who had preached the annual sermons on the previous Sunday.

Among the apologies for non-attendance was one from Sir Andrew Marshall Porter, Bart., Master of the Rolls, Dublin, who wrote to the secretary (Rev. J. A. Kelly) expressing great gratification at having been asked to preside at the meeting, and his regret that it was not possible for him to come to Belfast on that day.

Rev. GEORGE J. SLIPPER read the annual report, which stated that the operations of the Association had been directed towards the infusion of fresh life into the work of disseminating the principles of Unitarian Christianity. The Depository had been supplied with many new books, and the sermon preached on behalf of the Association by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers in April, 1901, entitled "How does Jesus Take Away our Sins," has been separately printed. Particulars were also given of the Postal Mission work that had been carried on, and the need of further resources was emphasised.

Rev. J. A. KELLY submitted the financial statement, which showed a debit balance of £11 6s. 2d.

The CHAIRMAN moved the adoption of the report, which was seconded by Mr. JOHN ROGERS, and agreed to, and Mr. JAMES DAVIDSON then moved a resolution welcoming the Rev. E. Daplyn, and thanking him for preaching the annual sermons. He hoped Mr. Daplyn would have formed such a favourable impression of Ireland that he would be able to show to his family that Ireland was a delightful place to live in.

Mr. DAPLYN duly acknowledged the vote.

The Committee having been re-elected Principal GORDON moved a resolution of renewed adhesion to the principles of the Association. He said he was always glad to be present on occasions of that kind in order that he might throw in his sympathy with the work they were carrying on. What he would like to emphasise was that the search for authority in religion had led in some cases to joining the Church of Rome, and in other cases to desertion from it. They could not be content with their own limited vision or with their own uninspired aspirations. They needed to be carried above themselves, and he said that if any man found authority in any ancient Church his duty was to follow that guiding light, and if he did so it might prove a passage-way to something better than itself. In their rules they laid great stress on the Scriptures and the Lord Jesus Christ. He was sure they were all glad to see that in the headquarters of that ancient Church, in Rome itself, the Bible was put into a somewhat different position — that the Gospels were freely circulated in the vernacular among the Italian nation. Their experience was that the spirit of the Bible had been effective through a long history. They thought that they embraced its truths more intelligently, and he hoped they held them as devoutly as their fathers did.

Mr. JAMES DAVIDSON (Knock) seconded the motion, which was carried.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Mr. JAMES M'KISACK, it was agreed that the Committee be authorised to consider a change of date of the annual meeting and sermons to one earlier in the year.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman and tea-makers concluded the meeting.

FROM a report specially prepared concerning the needs of Bradford (Yorks.) Methodism, it appears that the membership in nine Wesleyan circuits stands about where it did in the year 1876, although the general population has increased by nearly 40,000; and that during the last twenty years there has been an actual decrease of 1,242 members. There is no doubt whatever that attention being called to these facts there will be a very considerable movement made in Bradford during the next few years. Already a plan for the purchase of certain sites, the erection of certain new chapels, and the organisation of mission work has been prepared, of which more may be heard by-and-by.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., acknowledges, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mr. Plumptre, 10s. 6d.; Mr. John Harrison, £2 2s.; Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, £10; Dr. Harris, £1 1s.; Miss Hibbert, £1 1s.; B. X., £2.

A SMALL talent, if it keeps within its limits and rightly fulfils its task, may reach the goal just as well as a greater one.—Joubert.

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

TENTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

NINE schools had entered for the Choral Competition at Essex Hall on Saturday, April 25, but owing to illness among the members Rhyl-street had unfortunately to withdraw, and the eight competing choirs were: George's-row, conducted by Miss Amy Withall; Islington, conducted by Miss Harris; Newington Green, conducted by Miss Maud E. Turner; Essex Church, conducted by Mrs. Reuben Oakeshott; Brixton, conducted by Mr. H. Farrow; Highgate, conducted by Miss Amy Withall; Limehouse, conducted by the Rev. J. Toye; and Stepney, conducted by Miss Harris.

Each choir rendered the test piece, A. W. Fletcher's "Minstrel of the Night," and another piece of its own choosing.

The adjudicator, Mr. C. J. DALE, in making his award, which was read by the PRESIDENT, Mr. J. Harrison, said:—

The work of hearing the eight choirs in competition has been one of the pleasantest in my experience, and I deeply regret I cannot remain to compliment the children and their conductors. I note decided improvement in the average excellence of the singing. There is far less difference between the highest and the lowest than there was two or three years ago. In discipline, alertness, eagerness, and enthusiasm, the marks I have given are wonderfully equal; so near are they that they do not affect the result.

In the award Mr. Dale placed Highgate first, Essex Church second, and Islington third. Later in the evening the President therefore handed the banner to the Highgate choir. It was won last year by Islington, and in the year before by Newington Green. Highgate had held it once before in 1898.

There were from 250 to 300 present at the competition, most of whom stayed for tea, and in the evening a concert was given by the united choirs and other friends, conducted by Mr. E. A. Reeves of Brixton. Mr. John Harrison, who presided, expressed his great pleasure in the occasion and his sense of the great value of such a competition, and the training it involved. The audience, which was large and appreciative, joined in the opening and closing hymns, and the concert was greatly enjoyed.

THE following incident is given on the authority and in the words of the Free Methodist:—"A beautiful instance of Methodist fraternity and Christian helpfulness has recently been seen in the little town of Egremont in Cumberland. There are three Methodist Churches in the town, the Wesleyan, Free Methodist, and Primitive. The two former were free from debt, but the latter, which was the most recently erected, was burdened with a debt of £250. The members of the Wesleyan and Free Methodist Churches very generously came to the help of their Primitive brethren, and rendered them such practical service that the debt was extinguished, and a balance of £20 left in hand. Nothing of the kind has ever been known in the history of the Cumberland Free Churches."

A FAREWELL SERMON.

THE Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein concluded his ministry at Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, on Sunday morning, May 3, taking for the text of his farewell sermon Philipp. ii. 5, "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." In the course of his sermon, referring to the significance of these words, he said that without presuming to speak for anyone but himself, and in the hope that what he felt might help others to define their own feelings, he would take some characteristic sayings of Christ of whose origin there could be no doubt. "Love is the fulfilment of the law," "Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you," "Pray to be heard of God and not to be seen of men," "Forgive as ye would be forgiven," "Where your treasure is there will your heart be also," "Ye cannot serve God and mammon," "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness," "Judge not that ye be not judged."

Were these sayings true because Jesus said them, or in virtue of their own inherent worth? The ultimate test of their value was what they conveyed. Men had differed much as to the nature of the light that was in those sayings, but for us it was true that those sayings of Jesus derived their value from the effectiveness of their appeal to the conscience. We loved them and him who said them, because of an inner conception of their preciousness. It followed then that we had an inward witness to the truth and beauty of those sayings, revealing to us the mind of Christ. And while that inward witness testified to the truth and beauty of that mind of Christ, it did not create that mind. It was simply the power we had of feeling in unison with something whose ring created a corresponding vibration within us. It simply meant that men's minds were able to approach more or less closely to what Christ taught, and from century to century come nearer to the real meaning of what he said. Once he was thought to speak merely of deep theological mysteries, at another time only of a political organisation intended to put its foot on the necks of kings and peoples as the mediæval theory of a Church. But now they were beginning to see that he meant something far more precious—the renovation of the heart; something not political, but ethical. The fact that we had such a testimony in ourselves does not diminish the value of Christ's own testimony or the testimony of other men. Good men well known to history had said practically the same thing, and this only renders more acceptable to us Paul's great saying, "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus."

In conclusion, Dr. Klein said:—With these words I should naturally desire to close my ministry to you. These words should represent my highest wish for you, my most earnest prayer, as they undoubtedly represent the greatest need of any Christian Church. The mind of Jesus, the deeper and broader your conception of it, will alone enable you to give effect to those ideas of truth and righteousness and freedom which you have come to associate with the mission of your churches. The future of those churches does not rest now, any more than moral and spiritual works have rested in the past, on mere wealth, on mere social influence, or on mere learning; still less on definitions with a venerable past, on traditions and customs grown obsolete and useless amidst the ever-changing conditions of life and thought. Their future obviously rests upon their power to be in fact what their leaders say they are—namely, the highest expression of the highest religious feeling of our age, the most accurate expression of the most accurate religious thought of our age, the purest expression of the social ideas realised in our age. Their future lies in their power to anticipate the development of these characteristics in other churches. For if they should develop at the same rapid rate in other churches, there could be no place for you. There could only be what always remains, the power of individuals to take refuge where truth and goodness have found their safest home. Your churches, in other words, shall be faithful to their duty to be of the advanced posts and not merely of the reserve. And besides, your churches shall be of the people for the people, and managed by the people themselves, in close and direct connection with their spiritual teachers. There shall not be any attempting permanently to maintain class influence and class distinctions whilst claiming to be free.

A church disregarding these things must end in disaster, because it cannot make the mind of Christ the basis of its existence. The great past history of churches proves it. The slow but sure declension in the present influence of all churches proves it also. Men cannot be seriously attracted and retained in a church by methods which in their eyes are not sufficiently distinguished from the methods of the world. Men cannot be seriously attracted and retained by a spirit which recalls too obviously, not the mind of Christ, but the mind which Christ came to cleanse and purify. In fact, we must talk less of the brotherhood of man and pay more reverence to our brothers; we must talk less of love and show more love; we must talk less of freedom and allow more freedom and adopt methods which as worshippers as well as citizens will set men free. So in relinquishing a place which for some years I have endeavoured to fill among you, I feel I could not leave you a better or a nobler watchword than these words of the great apostle: "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus," the mind which called blessed the poor in spirit, the mind which called blessed those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, the mind which called blessed the meek, the peace-makers and the pure in heart. Let this mind be with you and with your spirits.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Ainsworth.—On Wednesday evening, April 29, the Rev. M. R. Scott gave a very excellent report as one of the delegates to the National Triennial Conference at Liverpool. Several questions were answered, and some discussion followed. A vote of thanks to the delegates and to Mr. Scott for his report was cordially passed. Mr. Joseph Tootill, the senior warden and secretary, presided over the meeting, which was a very representative one. A tea-party, promoted by lady members of the congregation, was held in the school on Saturday, friends from Elton providing an excellent entertainment. The proceeds, which were for the renovation fund, realised £4 17s., which nearly clears off the debt.

Astley.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday, April 26, by the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth. Special hymns and anthems were sung by an augmented choir, under the leadership of Mr. A. Hunsworth, J.P. The collections and donations amounted to £22 9s. 6d.

Bolton: Unity Church.—On Sunday, May 3, the Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. H. M. Livens, formerly minister of the church, the service in the morning being conducted by the Rev. Wilfred Harris. The services throughout were attended by large congregations. A hearty reception was accorded to Mr. and Mrs. Livens, and the renewal of old acquaintances with happy recollections of the past was very much appreciated. Mr. Livens gave very eloquent and encouraging addresses, and the choir rendered special anthems, the children, under the leadership of Mr. Joseph Lancaster, jun., singing admirably. The collections, £50 12s., showed an increase on last year. Owing to the inclement weather the usual procession could not take place. By donations received since Sunday the amount is increased to £54 6s.

Cardiff.—The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A., concluded his ministry of West-grove Church on the last Sunday in April, and in the evening preached an eloquent sermon, "To Young Men," to a crowded congregation. Several members of the congregation met on Friday evening, May 1, at a coffee supper, to bid farewell to Mr. and Mrs. Davis. Mr. Frederick Childs, Chairman of the Church Committee, presided, and, in a few well chosen remarks, presented to Mr. and Mrs. Davis, on behalf of all those present, a purse of money, as a mark of their appreciation of their services to the church for the past four and a-half years. Several ladies and gentlemen also spoke in felicitous terms, all wishing God-speed to Mr. and Mrs. Davis in their future career. Mr. Davis suitably replied. Between fifty and sixty persons were present, and the proceedings passed off with much cordiality. The Rev. James Harwood, B.A., of London, will conduct the services at West-grove during the month of May.

Dudley.—A successful Sale of Work was held at Baylies's school on Wednesday, April 29, in connection with the Sunday-school and Recreation Club, and was opened by Mrs. G. Bean. The Rev. G. St. Clair presided.

Mossley.—On Sunday the Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted, in the morning and evening, by the Rev. J. E. Stead, of Park-lane, Wigan, and in the afternoon by the Rev. T. R. Elliott, resident minister. The collections were in advance of last year, and amounted to £45.

Sheffield.—The annual social gathering of the Unitarian churches of Sheffield and the district was held in the Channing Hall on Thursday evening, April 30. After tea the chair was taken by the Master Cutler (Mr. A. J. Hobson), who was supported on the platform by the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones, H. Thomas, E. G. Evans, W. Stephens, A. H. Dolphin, and J. E. Jenkins. Mr. Ceredig Jones referred to a recent heretical address by a Congregational minister at Bradford, who had declared that Unitarianism was dead, and his new theology made it impossible. Yet as a matter of fact his new theology was Unitarianism pure and simple. Their great gatherings at the National Conference at Liverpool had been anything but funereal, and the way in which the Yorkshire bazaar was being promoted was a good augury for the future of their cause. Addresses were also given by the other ministers present, and an excellent musical programme was provided.

Sheffield: Unitarian Mission.—A very enjoyable social evening was held on Monday, April 27, in the Upper Room of the Vestry Hall, Attercliffe, where Divine services have now been held every Sunday evening since October, 1901, and a Sunday-school was started on the third Sunday of last January twelve-month. Friends in the district have shown unparalleled faithfulness and enthusiasm towards the "Forward Movement" from the very beginning. The congregations have been far beyond expectation, and the matter now under serious consideration is the advisability of having a permanent church in some convenient spot in the district. Addresses were given by the Revs. J. E. Manning, J. E. Jenkins, and Messrs. Paul Gill and Thurston G. Turton, and other friends provided a pleasant musical programme. At the close of the meeting Mr. Whitehouse, the President of the Mission, moved a resolution of regret at the departure of Mr. and Mrs. Manning and Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins from Sheffield, and of best wishes for their welfare and happiness, adding an assurance that the good work they had initiated at Attercliffe should be carried on. The resolution was unanimously passed, and Mr. Jenkins made a suitable response.

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plynlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MONDAY week, May 25, is the centenary of Emerson's birth, and we intend that THE INQUIRER of May 23 shall be a special Emerson Centenary number. Among the articles that we hope then to publish will be "Emerson's Inspiration for Religion," by the Rev. W. J. Jupp; "Emerson's Theism," by Professor Upton; "The Divinity School Address," by the Rev. H. Gow; "Representative Men," by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor; Emerson's "Conduct of Life," by the Rev. E. W. Lummis. That all these and others will get into the one number we cannot promise, but we hope they will. Orders for extra copies of this "Emerson" number should be sent in at once.

WE have not invited "Impressions" of the Conference this year, but we shall be glad as soon as the Whit-week meetings are over to afford space for a full discussion of the proposals that have been made. By that time the Report of the Proceedings should be in everybody's hands, and there will have been time for quiet consideration. We advise congregations who wish to have copies of the Conference Reprint to send their orders at once to Mr. Philip Green, at Essex Hall. When that thousand is exhausted friends will have to fall back upon the two extra numbers of THE INQUIRER. The cost is 3d. in either case.

COMPARE the advertisement of the Whit-week Dance in our present number with that of a fortnight ago, and meditate upon the moral. Some of the promoters of the Dance think that they had "authority," because the committee of the B. and F.U.A. undertook to enclose a notice of it, with the notice of their own meetings. It is a question for the casuists. Our advice is, Let those who wish to dance, dance to their hearts' content!

MR. THOMAS BARCLAY, who is an ex-president of the British Chamber of Commerce in Paris, and has been actively engaged in promoting the proposed Anglo-French Treaty of Conciliation, addressed the Manchester Chamber of Commerce on May 6 as the beginning of a campaign in England, and expounded the objects of the movement, to provide something similar to what was proposed in the Anglo-American Treaty of 1897, which provided for three negotiators on each side. It would be a means of protracting negotiations and blunting the edge of the violent anger that often arises between nations on small provocation, would save nations from being thrown into frightful combat through a failure of health or temper or skill in a single individual on one side or the other, and would register the growing desire for security in peaceful friendship between two mutually helpful nations, but the exact terms of the treaty were, of course, not settled beforehand. The present time is most opportune for such a treaty, the part played by the mercantile world, Chambers of Commerce and Trades Unions, in furthering the proposal exemplifies the peaceful results of trade intercourse and the growing sense of international dependence. The reception of Mr. Barclay and his proposals by Manchester men of business was most cordial, and there was no dissentient voice to the resolution, not of agreement merely, but of determination to spend time and money in support.

THE Methodists are holding, or have been holding, their annual Missionary meetings. The Wesleyans secured the services of the Rev. R. J. Campbell to preach the annual sermon. The secretary's report, containing various encouraging statements, yet announced that the income of the Missionary Society had not been satisfactory since the year 1875. There had been years in which it had fallen £10,000, £12,000, and at one point even £18,000 lower than in 1875. It was urged that by the centenary year (in ten years' time) the income of the Society ought to be doubled.

AT a following meeting the point was well emphasised by Dr. Glover of the Baptist College in Bristol. He first paid the Wesleyans a magnificent compliment, acknowledging the indebtedness of the whole Christian Church to Methodist missions of past times. They had a happy organisation, battalion drill which could concentrate, unite, and marshal their people; and they were [sound at heart in their faith. But he went on to remind them that they had had no substantial increase in their missionary work for a generation. He knew one missionary society that for every shilling it had in 1837 had six shillings now. The Church Missionary Society had for every shilling it had then 5s. 5d. now; the London Missionary Society had 2s. 10d. for every shilling it had then, the Bible Society 2s. 6d., the Wesleyan Missionary Society 1s. 6d.! The criticism seems to have been well received, and probably the little exercise in comparative anatomy, revealing facts no doubt new to many hearers, will prove more effective than any other oratory would have been.

AT the Bible Christian (Methodist) Missionary Convention an address on "The Heathen at Home" was delivered by Mrs. Ormiston Chant. As one would expect, many of her sayings were capable of application outside Methodism, and beyond what is specially called "missionary" activities. Two or three sentences from a much abbreviated report may be given:—"The Church was not made up of the minister, but of the people in the pew, plus the minister. If every man and woman saw that his and her duty was the same as the minister's they would have the Churches really at work. They could easily give a reason why they could not do the work, but they must bring themselves to the cross of Christ. She had attempted to stop a fight between two boys just before coming to the meeting. Men were standing round without making any attempt to stop the fight, but they would all have been able to give a reason for not attempting to stop it. Boys ought not to fight, as Christ came to give them the power to do without physical fighting, and those boys needed those powers . . . She sometimes thought there were young men and women who did better work the greater the difficulties they had to overcome, and that was why they make good missionaries abroad, and there were young people whose hearts were breaking at home who would make good home missionaries. They could not expect good home influence from the slums. Men were so surrounded by misery that it killed all that was in them of God, and then there came the work of Christ which was being done in that church and in Victoria Hall, to get to the slums and lift the people up. Mrs. Chant gave an instance of a house she visited, where the wife had died and there was only one room, and for three days the coffin had to rest in the same room where the husband and children had to sleep and eat. They were fighting the things which crushed sentiment, for that led them up to God. It was the people who were indifferent who created the slums."

THE WHITSUNTIDE MEETINGS AND TEMPERANCE.

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me through your columns to call the attention of friends attending the Whitweek meetings to the temperance meeting arranged for Friday evening, June 5, at Essex Hall? The Earl of Carlisle has kindly undertaken to preside, and we have promises of support from the Rev. Chas. Hargrove and other speakers. I sincerely trust that a large proportion of visitors to the B. and F. meetings will make a point of staying to the Friday evening meeting. It is a noteworthy fact that the Unitarian body are far behind other denominations in zeal for temperance reform. The trustees of the Wesleyan Million Guinea Fund have voted £10,000 to the promotion of temperance work, and seeing how large a proportion of the misery, wretchedness, and crime that exist, especially in large cities, is due to drink, it is to be hoped that those who have faith in a liberal Christianity will either devote themselves to the work or aid those who are working to remove this great stain from our national character.

I observe by your columns that a "dance" has been unfortunately arranged for the same evening as our temperance meeting, but as the latter begins at 7.30 it will be possible to attend both; but if those who cannot be with us at Essex Hall will kindly send a contribution to our treasurer, Mr. F. A. Edwards, 8, Iffley-road, W., they will greatly relieve the financial anxiety in which the increasing work of the Association places our Committee.

J. Bredall,
Joint Hon. Sec. National Unitarian Temperance Association.

THE LEAVEN WORKS.

Sir,—It appears to me unfortunate, and even false, in estimating the work of those free and unsectarian, non-dogmatic churches and congregations, the interests of which your journal most sympathetically represents, to rely upon statistical returns—which offer no indication whatever of that higher and far wider spiritual power they possess, the passive sovereignty they hold, and the immeasurable religious influence which for the common good they inevitably obtain. The telling energy of your movement, it might well be said, is more active in other churches than in your own. A devoted recognition is accorded to Dr. Martineau among Congregationalists, which those who bear the denominational appellation he himself cordially detested often fail to render to the worth and usefulness of his views. On this account I should like to draw your kind attention to a volume of sermons by a Congregational minister, the Rev. H. W. Clark, of Woking. Here, at its very best, you find your own teaching. This book, entitled "Meanings and Methods of the Spiritual Life," demonstrates the spreading and pervading potency of that wider revelation for which you stand. Doubtless the same generous tendency could be discerned in many utterances of the orthodox. No one can say how greatly your movement has contributed to this better spirit in our midst. In the same way one small church, free and unknown to the perils and the pains of dogma, living out its lowly life in the centre of churches bound and led captive, exercises an influence beyond its own mean walls which cannot be justly gauged by the attendance of the critical at the morning and the evening meetings, or by the number of children who attend the Sunday-school. The spiritual good is more than that which is but outward, and only visible until it has passed and perished.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

APPEAL.

For the Children.—Miss Jennett Humphreys, of 5, Oak-grove, Cricklewood, N.W., writes:—I shall be much indebted to you if you will allow me to ask our friends to give me any Christmas, New Year, or other picture cards they may have left to them from past sendings. These give great pleasure to little children, and as most houses are now being cleared out for the (upsetting) "spring cleaning," if friends know I can make good use of such cards, &c., they may be induced to post them to me instead of putting them into the waste-paper basket.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead.—Some 400 children of the United Schools joined in the anniversary on Sunday, May 10, when there were large congregations at the Old Meeting House. The musical part of the service, for which the children are responsible, is always a special feature, the hymns being written by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, and the tunes composed by Mr. David Churchill, master of Stoke's Croft School, who has the training of the children. The hymns on Sunday were particularly pleasing, while Mr. Churchill was again happy in wedding words to music. The children acquitted themselves excellently, and their singing again at Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, on Sunday next, is being pleasurably anticipated. As in former years, the teachers found delight in decorating the chapel with flowers. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford addressed the children morning and evening.

Heywood.—On Sunday, the 10th inst., the Sunday-school anniversary was held, when the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, preached two eloquent sermons. Special hymns and anthems were rendered by the scholars, aided by a much augmented choir. There was a large and crowded congregation at both services, the offertories during the day amounting to £53.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The annual meeting and soirée took place on Thursday, the 7th inst., in the Hope-street Church Hall. The President (Mr. F. Robinson) presided, and there were over sixty members and friends present, representing the Ancient Chapel, Birkenhead, Bond-street, Bootle, Garston, Gatacre, Hamilton-road, Hope-street, Mill-street, Ullet-road, and Warrington Sunday-schools. The council's report for the year, read by the secretary, showed that good work had been done; the meetings during the year had all been very well attended, and had proved of much interest and help to the teachers. The statistics showed an increase of 280 scholars on the books, while there was only an increase of eleven new teachers; but the council noted with much satisfaction that there was an increase of fifty-five in the number of scholars over sixteen years of age, for it is these scholars that they most wish to keep in touch with, and to be able to help and influence. The treasurer's statement of accounts was satisfactory, showing a balance in hand of £1 4s. 9d. The council regretted the removal of the Rev. E. W. Lummis from Warrington, as they lose not only their vice-president, but a valuable and earnest member. The society having been asked to send a delegate to the meetings of the International Council at Amsterdam, a resolution was passed appointing one of the secretaries (Miss A. Hall) their representative. After the business, the visitor (the Rev. C. L. Briggs) read his report of the schools affiliated to the society, and roused some opposition by his views of Sunday-schools in general. He thought our schools were very much where they were a good many years ago; too much was attempted in the large schools, and he did not approve of taking in so many scholars, unless there were a really sufficient number of teachers for them, neither did he approve of the press-gang method of obtaining teachers. He spoke of the living and personal element being the greatest factor for good in our schools, of the need for teachers to feel that they must be less teachers of doctrine than friends to the children. The President moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Briggs, which was seconded by the Rev. W. J. Jupp. The Revs. H. D. Roberts, J. Morley Mills, R. A. Armstrong, and T. Lloyd Jones, Mr. Cooper and Miss Howell also took part in the discussion which followed.

Manchester: Longsight.—The thirty-sixth anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday, May 10, by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., of Gee Cross. Special music was sung at the morning and evening services, and in the afternoon the sacred cantata "Day and Night" was given by the choir. All three services were well attended.

Manchester: Oldham-road.—On Wednesday, May 6, the juvenile performance in aid of the Whitsuntide Fund, took place before a good audience, and was very successful. Songs, dances, and tableaux were very well done, and the entertainment closed with a delightful fairy play, entitled The Dancing Princesses, kindly sent by Miss Florence Biss, of Exeter.

North-East Lancashire Sunday School Union.—The second conference of the year was held on Saturday, April 25, at Accrington, when there was a good gathering, the schools at Colne, Burnley-lane, Burnley, Padiham, Todmorden, Newchurch, and Rawtenstall being well represented. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. W. H. Burgess (president of the Union this year). He announced that the Manchester District Sunday School Association, with which they were affiliated, had secured the £1,000 aimed at by its recent bazaar. He thought it was satisfactory that the stall provided at that bazaar by their own local union had contributed upwards of £50 to the amount realised. A paper was then read by Mr. Thomas Kenyon, of Newchurch, on "Music as an aid in Sunday-school Work." He advocated the bestowal of special care upon the opening and closing services of the school. In addition to bright, familiar hymns, it was a good thing to have a well-chosen voluntary played while the scholars were assembling. Each school should try to keep up a good singing class. Where the structural arrangements of the school allowed, a freer use of music and singing in the classes themselves should be encouraged amongst the younger scholars. They should not only learn hymns by heart, but should learn to sing them as well. An annual musical competition among their schools might do much to raise the quality of their singing. A discussion followed, in which the Revs. Jenkyn Thomas and J. Shaw, Miss A. Haworth, and Messrs. Webster, Bibby, Ashworth, Wadsworth, Duerden, and others took part. A resolution was passed referring the matter of a musical festival and competition to the executive committee.

Rawtenstall.—The Rev. Jenkyn Thomas preached the Sunday-school anniversary sermons last Sunday afternoon and evening, and delivered an address to scholars, teachers, and friends in the morning. There was a good attendance at all the services, and chairs and forms had to be placed in the aisles to accommodate the large congregation in the evening. Owing to the heavy demands made on the members during the last three months for subscriptions, &c., for the forthcoming bazaar, diminished collections were expected; but they exceeded anticipations, and amounted, with donations, to £40 9s. 6d.

Swansea.—The Rev. W. Tudor Jones and his wife are attending the Summer Semester at the University of Jena, and will be absent from home until the end of July. The pulpit is supplied by various Unitarian ministers of South Wales. Mr. Jones's address is Lutherstrasse 18, Jena, Germany.

Swinton (Presentation).—On Wednesday evening, April 30, a meeting was held in the Free Church Sunday-school to bid farewell to Mr. Charles Pollitt, who is removing to Glasgow, and to give expression to the gratitude and warm appreciation he has earned through his services to the Sunday-school, formerly as teacher and secretary, and for many years as superintendent. The Rev. W. E. George presided, and on behalf of school and church offered the sincerest good wishes to Mr. Pollitt on the promotion which had led to his removal to Glasgow. Mr. Richard Robinson and Mr. Lee Jones joined in the expressions of gratitude and goodwill, and Mr. George then presented to Mr. Pollitt, on behalf of the scholars, teachers, and friends, a handsome Gladstone bag and silver-mounted umbrella. Miss Lansdale also presented to Mrs. Pollitt a beautiful cruet on behalf of the Ladies' Sewing Society. Mr. Pollitt, in acknowledging the gifts, spoke of the happiness he had found in the work of the school, and pleaded for a loyal support of all the allied institutions.

Several items of News and other Matter unavoidably held over until next week.

LITERATURE.

THE DIVINE LIFE.*

Dogmatic Theology is not a subject held in much esteem by Liberal thinkers. Indeed the usual meaning attached to the terms is in direct opposition to the principles of free and unbiassed investigation by which they profess to be guided in their study of religion. Dogma implies something determined before and independent of all inquiry. It is the obligation of the orthodox theologian to accept it for truth, just as would any child who was being taught the catechism. Dogmas are the axioms of his art, and the only support he brings to them is to show that they are possible, probable, not contrary to reason. For the rest his task is that of exposition, solution of difficulties, confutation of objections. His main reliance is on authority, the authority of a book, a church, a consensus of opinion. To those who do not admit his authorities he does not appeal, unless it be by way of a previous treatise whose object is to establish their worth.

This work of the late Professor Bouvier, of Geneva, brought out under the careful editorship of his former pupil and colleague, Professor Edouard Montet, may be commended to all who seek to attain to a religious belief which shall be founded on facts attested by their own consciousness and experience, and not on authority external to themselves.

"The Divine Life," this is the central idea of the book. The Divine Life as God in its absoluteness and Infinite perfection. The divine life in man attested by history, reason, conscience—its beginnings, the hindrances to its development, its various manifestations and supremely in the person of Jesus Christ—its consummation in Eternal Life. Such is briefly the method by which the author embraces in his survey all the burning questions of modern theology.

He will not admit of the supernatural as a distinct mode of divine action, an interference of God on special occasions not to be adequately met by ordinary law. The action of the spirit of God, he says, is permanent and continuous both in nature and in humanity.

New facts which seem as if the outcome of extraordinary intervention have been long in preparing. Is the preparation indispensable to their accomplishment? Is it also supernatural? And the whole of history therefore, is it supernatural? Be it so; but then if everything is supernatural nothing is such. If the natural and supernatural cover exactly the same ground there is no distinction between them.

So he concludes that the two, generally set in opposition one to the other as when we speak of Natural and Revealed Religion, are but two ways of regarding the operation of God, the divine action as manifest to us in all nature and history. It is supernatural as the expression of the Sovereign Will, which is the law, the order, the harmony, the purpose of all that exists. It is natural when considered as inherent in all created being, of which it is the cause and the support, so that without it they could not have come into being or continue.

To sum up, the idea of the supernatural is neither well-grounded nor well-defined; and it is impossible to distinguish the domains of the natural and supernatural.

It is obvious that a dogmatic theology, which starts from principles subversive of the very foundation hitherto assumed by theologians, must be of a very different sort from that hitherto taught in the schools; and we are relieved to know that we start upon our enquiry into Religion free from the assumptions which prescribe the conclusions we are to arrive at before yet we have commenced.

What then are the facts, according to M. Bouvier, on which the science of the Divine Life is to be founded? These two mainly—first, the religious sentiment, one of the essential elements of human life, perhaps the most characteristic of man who has been defined as a religious animal. The sentiment is indestructible and reappears each time that it has been awhile suppressed or enfeebled. Secondly, Christianity, or the divine life manifested and communicated to humanity by Jesus, and by the spirit of Jesus in the history of the race.

But Christianity was not supernatural in the sense of its being something wholly new, miraculous, not led up to and prepared as all other events. Just as animal life appeared first in the lowliest forms and was slowly through the ages developed till it reached its climax in man; just as the conscious and rational life had in like manner humblest beginnings, and we can assign no date to its birth nor say of some great man that he first taught men to think and know themselves; so is it with the Christian life. If it attained its fullest glory in Jesus, if through him it was realised by men as never before, yet was he not the discoverer of it. Men lived of that Life before him, do live of it without him. He was the choicest flower of the seed of religious life sown of God in the human heart; but root, stem, leaf, bud, all were there before he was revealed.

The Hebrew fear of God, a fear which does not exclude the most perfect trust, "and even a sort of familiarity," found its consummation in the life and teaching of Jesus. A consummation which the Pharisees strove to hinder, clinging to the particularism and unique privileges of Judaism in despite of the universal kingdom of God. In them was embodied the pretension, contrary to the design of God and the law of history, to close revelation with the law and the prophets, to impose a national religion on humanity, and to hinder every attempt at progress. It was against them therefore that Jesus directed his most vehement denunciations, rather than against publicans and sinners who did not prevent others entering in if they themselves stayed outside. So the Gospel of the Kingdom was in the order of nature. The entrance to it was long made ready, its laws, its animating spirit, its destiny, its final triumph, this is the subject of the preaching of Jesus.

The kingdom of God is not a society constituted in human fashion, regulated by a kind of etiquette, it is not a community, a sect, a theocracy. It is a social ideal, a social principle which ought to be the ruling motive and the binding tie of all earthly societies. It is a community of sentiments in regard both of God and man, which, governing all aggregations of men, will conduct them to liberty, unity, harmony, to all good things spiritual and temporal. These common sentiments constitute an organic whole; it is the body, the human organism of the Divine Life. And the Gospel is not content with the proclamation of this kingdom, it seeks to form it, to make it live, grow, nourish and repair itself.

The Church, then, is not constituted by government, or creeds, or ceremonies, but by life. Those in whom the spirit of Jesus lives are members of it, no matter by what name they call themselves, or what opinions they hold. It is the life of the animal body which makes it a whole; nothing belongs to the body which does not share that life; and what in any way partakes of the life, though only as bone or hair, is of the body. So it is with "the body of Christ"—the spirit of Jesus lives in it.

And the end of this life begun on earth is the Life Eternal, which is not a new thing which follows upon death, but a continuation of the very life we here participate in.

The knowledge of human nature, the great laws of which subsist beyond this mortal life as here, does not permit us to entertain the idea of a perfection instantaneously arrived at and immovably fixed. The eternal life must needs be a continual progress in all good. As we become more perfect, we shall become more ourselves, more secure from all risk of loss, of destruction; we shall be, so to speak, more immortal.

This idea of an infinite progress may be objected to on philosophical as well as theological grounds. To me it does not commend itself as consonant with either scripture, or tradition, or reason, or, what is more important by far, with the highest aspirations of man. The Vision of God as taught by the Church of old, in which the consummation of each nature is reached, and the highest and the lowest finds its full and perfect satisfaction, is, I believe, both more philosophic and more religious.

But we may say of this, as, indeed, of all the conclusions to which the pious and learned writer would lead us, what he himself says in conclusion of a long and impartial discussion of the Resurrection of Jesus. He defines it to have been "a truth, not a prodigy, the return of Jesus to Life, a life personal, celestial." And he continues:—

It will be seen that we have turned the position, in order to place ourselves upon ground less exposed to attack—that of the consciousness of the apostles and of us all. And it is upon this ground that we affirm the real heavenly life of Christ. We do so because his continued existence is indispensable to the Christian consciousness of life beyond death. Jesus, the most worthy of life, cannot be the one who is wholly dead. It is on this account, rather than because of apparitions which we have not seen and which if seen are insufficient to make faith secure, that we believe in the Resurrection. . . . But this will seem very unsatisfactory to some. It is not an adequate solution of the problem presented to us. "Give us something definite and final," they say.

Yes, both in Geneva and in Oxford they want certitude if certainty cannot be had. To whom replies the professor—and his answer may be taken as appropriate to the whole treatise:—

I do not think that persons of independent and inquiring mind will make this demand:

* "Auguste Bouvier: Dogmatique Chrétienne." Publiée d'après le cours manuscript et les notes de l'auteur, par Edouard Montet, Doyen de la Facuté de Théologie de Genève. Paris: Librairie Fischbacher. 1903. Two vols. 15 francs. Auguste Bouvier (1826-1893) was from 1865 to his death Professor of Christian Dogmatics in the University of Geneva.

they should desire this only, that we put them on the way to guide themselves among the multitude of different opinions, that we show them the right method, that we communicate the true spirit of theological research; they will do the rest themselves. They will not ask for an authoritative solution of their doubts, nor seek for a faith ready prepared for their digestion. And they are right. The contrary method is more convenient. It is pleasant to have a pillow made ready for a lazy head. But it is not the way of the Protestant Church. In theology one must gain one's bread, one's conviction of the truth, in the sweat of the brow. If, then, we had had a solution of the facts of the Resurrection which seemed to us perfectly satisfactory, we would rather have put readers in the way of finding it than present it to them for immediate acceptance.

It is more than twenty years ago that a deputation, headed by Dr. Martineau, waited on the Duke of Richmond, as then Lord President of the Council, to urge upon him that provision should be made at Oxford for the teaching of theology, precisely on those lines laid down by the Professor of the University of Geneva. To the Duke, who knew Martineau only as "the other gentleman," all that was said by little or big men, equally unknown to him, was mere foolishness. To teach theology by submitting to students the facts as ascertained or probable, and leaving to them the responsibility of drawing their own conclusions, was to upset everything established. And when he politely bowed us out of the room, he no doubt smiled at the queer lot he had been compelled to give a hearing to.

But what we sought for has been accomplished, though not in the way we desired. At Oxford theology is taught as a science; and if the devotion and learning of our professors does not avail to win to them a host of students, yet the principle is established in the University; and there now exists a college where tests are imposed upon neither students nor teachers, and it is required of none that he be Unitarian or Evangelical, but this only of all alike, that they be open to learn.

This remark may seem somewhat off the subject of this review, but it is not so really, for the tone of M. Bouvier's treatise and the method he pursues have kept me constantly in mind of our own English principal and the college over which he presides.

A man of like mind with M. Bouvier and Dr. Drummond is the Dean of the Faculty of Theology at Geneva, M. Montet, to whose pious labours on behalf of his former teacher we owe this valuable work. M. Montet will be remembered by those who attended the International Council of 1901 as the representative of Liberal Protestantism in Switzerland, and the reader of a paper on the religious movement in the Swiss Protestant Churches. His task as editor of the lectures to which he had listened as a student has doubtless been grateful and profitable to himself; it certainly has not been an easy one. More than 2,000 pages of manuscript, corrected, annotated, supplemented, at times in a very careful, sometimes in a very negligent hand, have had to be read, considered and compared. M. Bouvier was not of those teachers who, a lesson once written, are content to repeat it to generation after generation of students. He was ever learning, and ever trying to impart to his scholars the latest and best he had acquired. It has been the editor's task to distinguish the later and more mature thought from that of his earlier years, to complete with the aid of his own notes taken at the lectures what was defective in the manuscript, to incorporate into the body of the work the more notable corrections and suggestions which were added at various dates, and, perhaps the most difficult of all, to reduce these accumulations of twenty-eight years of teaching within reasonable limits. The work, as far as a stranger may judge of it, has been admirably done, and the Dean may be assured that the labour he has taken upon himself will not be lost. "If only our ideas become triumphant!" he said, at Essex Hall. He has himself contributed to this desired triumph of a religion "whose service is perfect freedom," and we render to him our thanks.

ECONOMICS AND SOCIOLOGY.*

To regret that the modern distinction between Sociology and Economics was not recognised from the first would be a mistake, because the growth of the youngest of the sciences has had to share the same vicissitudes as the others, yet the waste of energy involved is regrettable, and the more so in this case as human needs are more directly affected. When Adam Smith wrote, he wrote frankly of "wealth" in the economic sense, and only of humanity so far as involved in the production, &c., of wealth. His immediate successors followed on the same lines. They had no more idea of waiting for a science of human nature than have the compilers of "Bradshaw." And it does seem a little unfair that such a storm of invective should have been raised about these men. The explanation is that the condition of England aroused in Carlyle in 1840, and in Ruskin twenty years later, a great outburst of indignation, and for some reason or other Political Economy had to bear the brunt of the attack. Carlyle, like his great hero, could never assail evil except personally, and this time he flung his ink-pot at "the dismal science." Ruskin followed "the Master," and others, like Kingsley, were not wanting. A goodly fling resulted, and Political Economy was liberally bespattered. No doubt the cleansing that followed did the science a service, and meanwhile attention was certainly directed to the real need of the time—a science of human procedure which others, as Mill and Spencer, were more calmly pleading. The net result has been, not so much a reaction against Smith and Ricardo—who, to be just, never invited reaction—as a quite different attitude towards national conditions than formerly obtained, one that includes Economics as a branch of the wider, and as yet incompletely formulated, science of Sociology, the attitude represented by such present-day writers as Professor Marshall and Mrs. Bosanquet.

Dr. Carroll D. Wright does not seem aware of this, and it is a pity, for it takes from the force of the introduction which his publishers—one hopes, without consulting his taste—have given him on the cover of this book. "There is probably," say they, "no man in this country who has made wider investigations into industrial problems and labour conditions; no one capable of expressing sound and final judgment on matters pertaining to capital and labour." One cannot but lodge a protest in passing against this recrudescence of puffing—unhappily not confined to the other side of the Atlantic—that calls aloud for a second Macaulay to do it cruelly and classically to death. Turning to Dr. Wright's book, it must be acknowledged one does not find the high terms of the introduction substantiated. Dr. Wright may have made "wide investigations" into the strike in the Anthracite coal fields; he certainly gives no proof of such in the region of economic history; and as it is of the latter even more than of "industrial problems and labour conditions" of which he writes, this is very unfortunate. He writes as though Cairns and Carey, Bagehot and Jevons, to say nothing of Sidgwick and Marshall, had never been born, and he was still among the "dragons of the prime." Thus (p. 15), "The economists resent all encroachments of religion." Let the reader compare with this Chap. IX. of Sidgwick's "Principles." Again (p. 29), "The whole orthodox school of economists never admits to its curriculum the study of conditions not purely economic." Why, the most important contribution by the "orthodox school," as well as the ablest and sincerest contribution to economics of recent times, Professor Marshall's "Principles of Economics," is simply alive with conditions "not purely economic," and if Dr. Wright had consulted the first hundred pages he could have found a remarkable survey of purely human conditions as they affect economic theory.

These are but specimens of the attitude Dr. Wright takes up throughout his book. He seems to be indulging in a post-mortem on Gradgrind. He devotes page after page to examining "the old school," which, he tells us, is "not particularly the Manchester school." What school is it then? This is, however, an example of the principal difficulty one encounters throughout the book, the difficulty of forming any satisfactory notion of what the author is driving at. He hardly ever condescends to explain his terms, and the general looseness of construction both of thought and statement is simply baffling. So far as title and preface announce, his aim seems to be a plea for a recognition of a relation between sociology and religion. No man could set himself a more ambitious task, nor one demanding greater clearness of definition, wider acquaintance with history, and more conscientious accuracy of verification. As regards definition, Dr. Wright spends two pages in "consulting the lexicographers," with the result, as affects religion, of a crude array of most things that religion has meant to mankind in its more advanced stages. Sociology is "defined" in one and the same paragraph as a "science of social phenomena," a "habit of social relations," "the soul of society," "the vehicle" of that "soul," and "the divinest relations of men" (pp. 3-5).

This, so far as concerns clearness, is hardly encouraging. Scarcely happier is the result when an attempt at precision is made, as—e.g., "ethics is not religion, but is not ethics unless stimulated by religion"; or this, "the progress of the systems of labour gives to science a field for the practical application of the doctrines of evolution entirely relieved from the abstract philosophical distinctions which surround those doctrines when applied to growth in other departments" (p. 89). What does this mean? Is Darwin's "hedge-bottom" a more "abstract" field for the application of evolution than sociology? or Kidd's "Social Evolution" less "abstract" than Lord Avebury's book on bees? It is impossible to read a book intelligently in which familiar terms are used in an esoteric sense without the author affording one the least clue to what is passing in his mind. So, again, there is a constant confusion between "sociology" and "economics." Sometimes they are identical, sometimes distinct, sometimes the one includes the other. In some places, as on page 65, economic laws are regarded as precepts; in others, in the ordinary acceptation of statements. In what sense can economics be said to "insist on proper contracts respecting labour"? The law of the land may do so; economics has no more to do with it than it has with ordering a man to be hanged.

It is, however, when we come to Dr. Wright's main contention—the connection between sociology and religion—that one finds the result most regrettable. He simply contents himself with stating and reiterating throughout some hundred pages the very opinion that most thinking men desire to see proved. Thus, on p. 10, he says that "an ideal state of society is to be found only when religious elements predominate." On p. 37, "The highest industrial prosperity of nations has attended those periods most given to moral education and practice." He does not seem aware that we have only his word for this. Where is the necessary history in support of such a conclusion? The only answer Dr. Wright vouchsafes is (p. 70) that "illustrations of prosperity resulting from moral influence and public virtue could be drawn from the times of Louis XIII." (1610-43!) and then: "I need not accumulate citations." "Accumulate" is good! It is exactly what he need do, what an author who sets himself such a task is bound to do if he wishes to be heard. J. S. Mill, in his "Utility of Religion" is of the opinion that "the greatest recorded victory which education has ever achieved over a whole host of natural inclinations in an entire people—the maintenance through centuries of the institutions of Lycurgus—was very little if even at all indebted to religion." ("Essays," p. 82.) And again (p. 91), "Religious obligation, when not enforced by public opinion, produces scarcely any effect on conduct." How would Dr. Wright treat these statements?

The same looseness is exhibited in the few references that accompany the text. On p. 29, e.g., we have Mill's "Essays on Some Unsettled Questions" miscalled "unpublished questions." In referring to "Laing's" essays, the author is evidently unaware that of the two possible Laings, the one he refers to is not the one everybody knows and reads. W. R. Greg is incorrectly rendered, and the wrong volume of J. R. Green cited. In some cases the author's name appears without reference to the locality of the citation, in others whole sentences are quoted without any indication of their source.

With every desire to be fair, one must protest that this is not the way to write on sociology. There is no indication of reverence for the subject, or respect for the many and profound thinkers who have tried to grope their way through the intricate maze. It is scarcely less than an insult to the grave issues involved in the subject to treat it as it is treated here. To be sure, the volume is said, in all modesty, to consist only of essays, but that only further exposes a judgment that could deem such a subject within the narrow scope of the essay; while essays, even on "great subjects," are expected to be suggestive. This is neither one thing nor another. It does, indeed, contain some few pieces of information interesting after their kind, items about American factories and prison labour, and perhaps had Dr. Wright kept well within this class of topic, his "sound and final judgment" might have been exercised to some effect. As it is, however, the advertisement on the cover is suspiciously necessary.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Guilds' Union Year Book, 1903, edited by the Rev. John Ellis, will be found helpful to all who are interested in efforts to encourage closer religious fellowship and beneficent activities among our young people. Particulars of the Guilds' Union are given, and there is an interesting list of affiliated guilds, thirty-four in all, telling both of their various methods and the kind of work they undertake. Short articles on "The Guild Idea," and "How to form and carry on a Guild," are added, with a list of topics for guild meetings, and other matter. (S.S.A., Essex Hall. 3d.)

Evil not Everlasting is the title of an earnest and helpful paper read by the Rev. Osmond Dobrée, vicar of Colwich, to a Society of Sacred Study in the Rugeley Rural Deanery. Eternal punishment could only be if evil also were everlasting, which, because God is Eternal Goodness, is unthinkable. Punishment there must be, but "Love will conquer at the last." Such is the position clearly enforced. (Elliot Stock. 1s. net.)

Republics versus Women, by Mrs. Woolsey, attempts to prove that woman's position among a people whose government is a Republic is lower than her position under a monarchy. The more despotic the monarchy the higher the position of woman, appears to the author's thesis. Woman's political power is greater, it is maintained, in aristocracies than in democracies. But where one man only has political power, the position of woman would seem to depend largely upon the views of that man, and the fact that the men and women of any nation are equally without political power and liberty can scarcely be said to raise the position of women. Republics relied on to support the author's ideas are the United States, the republics of South America, and France. It is surely scurvy treatment of the 96 per cent. of monarchical government in the modern history of France that it should be neglected. On the other hand the fact that the ruler of China, an empire, happens just now to be a woman is apparently brought forward as evidence that women generally are in a higher position in that country than in, for instance, the United States, a republic. The book is in the form of what is said to be a verbatim report of a speech (110 pages; $2\frac{3}{4}$ hours for rapid delivery) at a meeting of women opposed to aristocracies and monarchies. The meeting is represented as having begun with the audience hostile to the speaker. It ended with them converted—to a woman. With humorously assumed vanity the author prints in brackets all the flattering exclamations, cheers, and "shrieks of laughter" which mark the progress of the conversion. On the whole this speech is amusing reading, apart from sad evidence of the position of child labour in some of the States. It will cause opponents of Women's Rights to chuckle, and lead even the most strenuous advocates of extending the franchise to women to admit that as there are men so there are also women ill-equipped for its wise exercise, and among them the author and her easily converted audience. THE DANGER OF TYRANNY.

SIR,—In his "Conference Notes," published in your issue of May 9, Mr. Armstrong gives utterance to a belief which seems to be widely spread among free catholics, and to explain much of their otherwise inexplicable reluctance to take common action for common aims. It is that no ecclesiastical organisation in history has ever failed to develop into an organ of suppression or oppression.

I challenge that belief. The Society of Friends and the Midland Christian Union are ecclesiastical organisations which cannot truly be described as organs either of suppression or oppression. A long list could easily be made of other ecclesiastical organisations, in Europe and America, which are equally free from either kind of tyranny. If the constitution of these, which are simply helpful, be contrasted with the various constitutions of the oppressive kind, a clear distinction will at once appear between the two classes. The tyrannical churches are those which unite in one body the functions of ecclesiastical order and of doctrinal definition. Those which scrupulously exclude standards of doctrine from their basis of union are thereby safeguarded against the tendency which Mr. Armstrong ascribes to all churches alike. Those of us, therefore, who grieve over the barrenness of our "unspoken sense of brotherhood," and desire to express it more effectively, and yet to avoid all danger of erecting an ecclesiastical tyranny, have a clear aim before us. To perform our common work we must have organisation, but we must not have doctrinal organisation. We must keep the trench wide and deep between the area of our work to develop church life and that of our work to disseminate our doctrines.

There is, then, a danger indeed to be guarded against, but it is not that against which Mr. Armstrong warns us. It is the danger that the body which has already grasped the reins of church government, though its basis and objects are professedly doctrinal, should be tempted to abuse its ecclesiastical powers in the interests of these doctrines which it exists to maintain. The issue, indeed, is not between organisation and atomism: organisation of some kind must needs come; the issue is between organisation on a basis of doctrine and organisation on a basis of free catholicity. Those who, with whatever motive, attempt to suppress the natural development of Conference, or cry "hands off from the Spirit's work, and let the Spirit labour without fellow-workers," are contributing to the establishment of a church organisation of the wrong kind, the kind which has always degenerated into tyranny.

MORAL ORDER AND A FUTURE LIFE.

Sir,—On my return from abroad, I found two letters from M. Jean Réville, referring to my article on his recent work "Le Protestantisme Liberal," which appeared in your issue of April 18. I have his permission to communicate to your readers the substance of these letters. They are in English. I give the second, with one or two additions, in brackets, derived from the first.

"I have read with special attention your two critical notes, for if praise is dear to man's heart, criticism is much better for man's mind. On the first point, I think that without a future life the moral law is bereft of an essential condition of authority. In the present state of our earthly life the moral law is constantly offended. The upright man suffers and the sinner is blessed. Bad actions provoke bad consequences, but, very often, for those who are not accountable for them. If there is no future life, if all is finished in the grave, then the moral law is not congenial with the real state of things. On that point I remain a Kantian, and I hold that not merely Christ's teaching, but a sound moral philosophy requires the belief in a future life. Such belief has been often misinterpreted by the different religions, which have made the future life dependent on their doctrines or their rites. But that seems not to be a reason for condemning the belief in itself, with its purely ethical content. [If there is no future life, I think this world is the most immoral creation that could be imagined. The principle that good must produce good consequences, and evil bad consequences, cannot be verified in the present world. And still it must be true; otherwise there is no Moral any more.]

"As to your second criticism, I want to say that I was aiming at the Positivists, who are very numerous in France, and who try to base the whole moral life of man solely on his duties to mankind, without any relation to a higher or supreme being. Now, I think, as you do, that we have duties towards our neighbours (parents, friends, colleagues, &c.) whilst they are working for us, and we have thus to work for them. But I do not understand why we should have duties towards humanity in itself, other than those which proceed from economic interdependence. Outside this little circle of parents or friends, men do not work for us: when they observe their social duties, it is because they think that it is better for them to live in a well-organised society. I am under no obligation at all to them for such conduct.

"Humanity has no right to call upon my esteem and my self-denying sacrifice, if there is not something divine in it. We are all dependent on the same general cosmical order, on the same laws of life; and therefore we have duties towards our fellow-dependent beings, because these duties are part of the general order under which we live. Otherwise, humanity itself becomes our God; I think it is an unworthy God. And humanity, after all, is but a part, and a very little part, of the Universe.

"[Neither man nor mankind is by itself sufficiently worthy of love and esteem, if there is nothing divine in them, to inspire the sacrifice of egoism to altruism. What makes them worthy of the devotion of ourselves to them is, precisely, the divine which is in human personality, the eternal element which acts in the passing phenomena of our life. It is because we are children of the same Heavenly Father that we are brethren.]"

I would add only two words: (1) It was far from my intention to seek to disparage, or invalidate, belief in a future life. I only deprecate the attempt to make this belief the ultimate sanction of morals, or to find in it a refuge for ethical perplexity. (2) M. Réville's last two paragraphs stand to him, I believe, for the same thing. To me they represent very different things. I think my relation to Personality, divine or human, cannot be adequately stated in terms of my relation to cosmical or social order. I learn from personal relations, little by little, what my relations might be, if mind and heart were large enough, to the totalities of nature and man; and from what I know of love I make "the venture of faith" in believing that the order I dimly apprehend behind both is a Law of Love. But I think I could not begin to apprehend God, or the divine in man, from a moral order that, morally, does not work, if that were, to me, a true account of what I see.

But M. Réville promises further discussion of these points in a second edition; and I learn with pleasure that an English translation of his work is already announced by Messrs. Williams and Norgate.

THE CONFERENCE HYMN-BOOK.

Sir,—In your issue of May 2 there was a letter from Mr. Wood headed "Conference Hymn and Tune Book," stating that "the book will be proceeded with immediately," and will be published "in the course of a few months."

Surely after Mr. Wood withdrew his proposal there cannot be any idea of in any way associating the Conference with the book, and yet that it is intended so to do is not an unfair inference from the letter.

A little light on the subject would be welcome. Thomas Harwood.

Bolton, May 12.

To Correspondents. — Letters, &c., received from the following:—E. L. S. B.; W. T. B.; P. D.; C. C. G.; L. A. J.; S. K. J.; W. J. J.; W. L.; A. P.; P. P.; C. T.; G. W.; J. J. W.

"THE UNITARIAN VIEW."

In a recent review of Carpenter and Wicksteed's "Studies in Theology," in the Daily Chronicle, there was a reference to Dr. Martineau's attitude towards the Unitarian name, which elicited the following letter from the Rev. J. Harwood, with the appended response:—

To the Editor of the "Daily Chronicle."

Sir,—In your interesting notice in to-day's Chronicle of works by the Revs. J. E. Carpenter and P. H. Wicksteed you incidentally and, of course, quite unintentionally, do a great injustice to Dr. Martineau. You say, "Dr. Martineau disliked the term 'Unitarian,' and would never describe himself as such." Not only is this misleading, it is the exact reverse of the truth. Dr. Martineau was an avowed Unitarian throughout his long life; he was a member of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the end. Nay, more, in one of his latest public utterances he declared: "If anyone, being a Unitarian, shrinks, on fitting occasions, from plainly calling himself so he is a sneak and a coward." And then he went on to say: "If, being of our Catholic communion, he calls his chapel or its congregation Unitarian, he is a traitor to his spiritual ancestry, and a deserter to the camp of its persecutors." Many people seem to find a difficulty in appreciating the distinction implied in these two sentences; but to Dr. Martineau it was vital and fundamental. I do not desire to argue the matter here, but merely to vindicate the memory of a great and dearly-loved teacher from what he himself would have regarded as a grave misrepresentation.—Yours, &c. James Harwood.

105, Palace-road, S.W., May 4.

[Mr. Harwood's letter seems to supply the interpretation of what was said in the review. We all, of course, know that Dr. Martineau was a Unitarian, and an active member of the "British and Foreign Unitarian Association." But his correspondence with Professor Knight, published in 1901, under the title "Inter Amicos," is clear evidence of his appreciation of Trinitarian theology—evidence that could be supported at length by quotations from his other published writings—while, in the course of that correspondence, he says plainly: "There is no such denomination [as the Unitarian body]; if there were, not for an hour would I belong to it." (P. 79.) Perhaps I should have said "he would never describe his Church as such.' But it is not easy to see the distinction which Mr. Harwood says Dr. Martineau regarded as vital.—Your Reviewer.]

If any of our readers share this difficulty let them consult the second volume of Dr. Martineau's collected "Essays, Reviews, and Addresses," and read his letters on "The Unitarian Position" and on "Church Life or Sect Life?" and the essay on "New Affinities of Faith."—Ed. Inq.]

OBITUARY.

MRS. JOHN R. NEILE.

One of the old links reminding Belfast people of the days of Dr. Henry Montgomery and his influential agency against the imposition of creeds has been snapped by the death of the above-named aged lady, a niece of his, and daughter of Alexander Montgomery. Born and brought up at Crumlin, co. Antrim, and resident in Belfast or vicinity as wife and widow of a well-known Unitarian, John R. Neile, active in the interests of our faith, she enjoyed a very extensive acquaintance with our denomination, and exercised a quiet prevailing usefulness, working for charitable interpretation of opponents, and a better judgment of issues concerned with "pure religion and undefiled."

Of singularly cheerful and self-sacrificing disposition, her appreciative willingness to take all for good caused her to be most warmly regarded by friends who shared in her acquaintance. She had attained very advanced years—eighty-five past—but wore their burden with light heart, and no clinging to a world she was prepared at a moment to leave. Her three daughters were married, one of them, Mrs. Carter Hollins, predeceasing her. The other two are Mrs. Holland, of Denbighshire, and Mrs. Dunkerley, of Comber, with whom she breathed her last. Her remains were interred in the Belfast Cemetery on May 6.

EMERSON AND PUBLIC WORSHIP.

Sir,—In his very interesting and eloquent address at the National Conference Dr. John Hunter quotes Emerson as having said that "the hold public worship had on men was gone or is going," and immediately proceeds to take him to task for mistaking "a passing mood" for "an inevitable and permanent tendency." May I point out that Emerson's words in no way make him amenable to such a charge? The whole sentence is as follows:—"I think no man can go, with his thoughts about him, into one of our churches without feeling that what hold the public worship had on men is gone or going," and he shortly afterwards asks, "What greater calamity can fall upon a nation than the loss of worship?" Thus it is perfectly clear that Emerson was speaking exclusively of what he had observed, and was generally acknowledged, as a fact belonging to that particular time. But if anyone were to say the same thing of the present time who could gainsay him? A thousand voices confirm the impression that there has been a serious decline in attendance on public worship, among the rest Dr. Hunter's own, whose whole address is but an elaborate proposal, by means of new attractions, to call men back to the sanctuaries they have forsaken and refill the vacant pews.

May I also say in regard to Mr. Wood's anecdote of Carlyle that when I last heard it, the saying that she "accepted the universe" was ascribed to Margaret Fuller, surely a much more likely person to have uttered it than Mrs. Somerville.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Common Field Flower.

"Mothee, don't you think it's a pity God did not make roses grow in the grass, instead of those common dandelions?"

So said Elsie Cullen one morning in May, when all the fields were covered with their early summer wealth of golden buttercups and dandelions.

"No, my child," said Mrs. Cullen; "I cannot say such an idea has occurred to me, for I love to see the happiness of the children, when first they find the bright yellow treasures, and learn to make long chains for each other's necks. They seem to feel as proudly happy in wearing their simple adornment as does the mayor when first he dons his chain of office! And when you come to think of it, Elsie, even the very name is interesting—meaning, as you may have learnt, a Lion's Tooth; this referring not, however, to the flower, but to the leaf of the plant. Even a poet and a scholar like James Russell Lowell found joy in thinking about the dandelion; and he has written a charming poem upon it, which, perhaps, I have not yet read to you." "No, mother," said Elsie, "you have not; but I never imagined a real poet would write verses on such a common flower! Whatever can he have found to say about it? Miss Easton read that poem by Robert Burns on the Mouse to our Form to-day; but a mouse is really so pretty and interesting, and it makes a little nest for its young ones." "Yes," said Mrs. Cullen, "the mouse is certainly a dear wee creature; but you must remember that we need useful herbs as well as pretty animals in our fields. And the Dandelion root has been greatly valued as a medicine: that, surely, is something in its favour!" "Yes," said Elsie, "of course it is, but do tell me what Mr. Lowell said about it, mother!"

"Why," answered Mrs. Cullen, "he said that when first, in the spring of each year, he saw the dandelion peep out of the earth amid its dark green leaves, it brought back to his mind all sorts of pleasant thoughts about the days of his childhood, when he lingered in the sunny meadows where the cattle grazed, and where there were gleaming rushes, and old trees, among whose boughs he heard the robin sing. So joyously did it sing that it seemed as if it were telling 'news of Heaven' itself! Water and sky lent each some share of beauty to the scene; and in these early days the child felt so at one with Nature that the simple field-flowers and the sweet-voiced birds had seemed to be his own familiar friends. So, my Elsie, I think you only need to grow a little older and a little wiser, and you, too, will begin to find pleasure in the simple field-flowers, whose wealth of golden splendour Nature has scattered so lavishly over the green earth. Even the common dandelion has its part to play in the world, and adds its share to the happiness of the great human family.

"Blue and yellow, pink and white
Flowers on earth are growing;
Prize them one and all, my child;
Each is worth your knowing.

"Some there are which cheer the eye,
Some whose scent gives pleasure:
Some, by grace of modesty,
Charm us without measure.

"So with flowers of human growth:
Each—God's bounty sharing—
Has some virtue of his own,
Truth, or love, or daring.

"Each one has his place to fill—
Just that, and no other:
Each can help the world a bit,
By helping on his brother."

BURNLEY FREE CHURCH COUNCIL.

It is probably generally known to readers of The Inquirer that Burnley was almost, if not quite, the only town in the country in which the Unitarians had a place in the Local Free Church Council. For many years Unitarians have held honourable positions on the local Council. A well-known Unitarian lady filled the presidential chair a few years ago, and for five or six years back a member of Trafalgar-street Church has acted as treasurer to the Council. One consequence of this inclusive spirit has been that the Wesleyans have, as an organised body, taken no part in the Council's work; another and more vital disability was that the National Federation of Evangelical Free Church Councils would have none of the Burnley Council until they also became "Evangelical."

For some time our sturdy representatives have seen signs of unrest, and a short time ago the secretaries of the Council, a Baptist minister and a Primitive Methodist minister waited on the committee of the Unitarian church to see if they could not relieve the tension by withdrawing. The matter was submitted to the members and they unanimously decided not to withdraw. The final fight came off yesterday week (Friday, May 8), when at a well-attended meeting of the Burnley Free Church Council, at which the "Evangelical" ministers were much better represented than usual, a vote was taken, and it was resolved by twenty-four to six to affiliate with the National Council, and henceforth the local Council will be known as "The Burnley 'Evangelical' Free Church Council."

Several orthodox friends stoutly supported the Unitarian position, and, after the decision was arrived at, the Rev. J. B. Parry, Congregational minister, and the senior Nonconformist minister in the town, who had previously spoken strongly in our favour, rose and declared that his connection with the Burnley Free Church Council ceased from that moment. The treasurer, who happens also to be the secretary of the Unitarian church, has since sent in his resignation. It ought to be stated, in justice to all concerned, that the men who have most strenuously advocated the triumphant policy have expressed strong regret at the necessity, and would apparently gladly welcome a change in the policy of the National Council towards the Unitarians. This fall from a lofty ideal to a position of merely practical expediency has been strongly emphasised by the Unitarian representatives during the controversy.

There is one question which I think we ought never to ask ourselves, and that is, "What will people think of me?" It should be instead, "How can I serve?"

THE EFFECTIVE POWER OF RELIGION.

A FINAL volume of conclusions, with an abstract of the whole, has still to be issued, of Mr. CHARLES BOOTH'S great work on "Life and Labour of the People in London." There are now sixteen substantial volumes, the first nine of which have been for some years before the public, while the remaining seven, dealing with "Religious Influences," the result of a further three years' inquiry, have been quite recently published. The first four volumes, as is well known, dealt with "Poverty," giving the results of an elaborate inquiry into the condition of the people; the next five gave an exhaustive survey of "Industry," particulars as to various trades and professions being carefully tabulated, and now in the new series of volumes we have ample material for a survey of the multifarious religious agencies at work in London and an estimate of their effect upon the life of the people. The sixteen volumes are now issued in a uniform edition by Messrs. MACMILLAN at the price of 5s. a volume, net; or the whole work may be had for 65s.; and certainly it is a work indispensable to every serious student of the bewildering problems of London life.

Our immediate interest is in the last seven volumes on "Religious Influences," but it must not be forgotten that these are part of a greater whole. Religious workers, whatever their particular connection, will find these volumes wonderfully rich in interest, with their elaborate accounts of every kind of effort from the work which clusters round the church in a well-organised parish, to the slum warfare of the Salvation Army, and the undertakings of social settlements and polytechnics. There is much vivid description and an abundance of searching criticism. Some of Mr. BOOTH'S judgments have been hotly resented; but it is better to accept with serious attention the material thus offered for the fresh consideration of great problems, by a man of great practical experience and manifest singleness of purpose, who has ungrudgingly devoted ample resources and high capacity to this inquiry.

This is a work the value of which is not to be quickly estimated, nor can it be dismissed in a hasty review; it may well be the subject of prolonged study, and we shall hope not once alone to return to its consideration. What we propose in this article is simply to call attention to the great significance and value of the work, and to give a few instances of the results at which Mr. BOOTH has arrived.

The seventh volume is complete in itself (except that its index, with that to the other volumes, is at the end of Vol. VI.), and will doubtless be the one most widely read. It contains a summary of the whole inquiry, dealing in turn with the Church of England, Nonconformist Protestant Churches, the Roman Catholic Church, Missions, and other religious effort, with a concluding chapter on the Position of Religion in London. From this chapter we will make our first quotation, as an example of the clear insight of the author, and the kind of stimulus that religious workers will find in this book, making for wisdom and a true devotion to the highest ends:—

> If the religious bodies would awaken energy for furthering the welfare of others, and would keep it pure, what they propose must be untainted, alike by the struggle of competition or by ignoring the work that others do, by magnifying their own office, by exaggeration of statement, or by bribery in all its subtle forms. But to avoid all this needs self-control besides humility of spirit, for all these things do in a certain low but definite manner "pay," and result in a melancholy success. Highly-coloured appeals bring in a golden return, treats and blankets swell the lists of mothers and children on the books of the undertaking, and, above all, the sectarian spirit binds and braces together the energies of the band of workers.
> But if religious propaganda and denominational appeals are apt to be tainted in these ways so far as their own adherents are concerned, the risks are far greater as regards those whom the religious bodies aim to serve. When the poor are made the subjects of such ignoble competition, the result is apt to show itself in cringing poverty with all its evils: lack of independence, hypocrisy, and lies, accompanied by the contempt of those who stand aside.
> Moreover, there is often an uneasy internal sense of rivalry, accompanied by the consciousness that the inability of the religious bodies to present a united front to the world, strengthens the ground of the unbeliever. General approval can only be won by aims that are felt to make for the general welfare, and in so far as denominations appear to regard themselves as of intrinsic individual importance they are apt to lose moral status in the public view. (Pp. 417-8.)

To this add the warning for ministers of every denomination, and for all those who care for their highest efficiency, contained in the following passage dealing with the ideal of clerical duty:—

> The whole conception of the duties of the clergy has changed and widened in the course of the last century. No body of men could possibly succeed in performing the strangely varied functions now expected of them—to detect abuses and instruct in the principles of sanitation; to study political economy and advise in trade difficulties and disputes between masters and men; to teach principles of thrift and household management, and to assist in finding employment for young people; to do duty as trustees or impressarios in providing art and amusement, guaranteed to be pure and wholesome, and, in fact, to be always prepared with a panacea ready made to fit any emergency.
> But the peculiar hardship of their situation is that not only are they unable to accomplish all that is looked for from them, but that the attempt to do so tends to unfit them for the work which has always been admitted to be proper to their calling. For the mazes of theology, for the effects of pulpit oratory, for the profounder consideration of the experiences of human nature and its spiritual needs, which can only be matured and digested amid a certain amount of leisure, they often leave themselves no time at all. Work of this character cannot possibly be done by men whose time is spent in button-holing Members of Parliament to get a clause introduced into a Bill, or in flattering painters to lend their works to an exhibition, or talented music-hall artistes to give help at an entertainment—efforts which, however hateful, become necessary when men feel that they have not only to provide the amenities of life for their flocks, but that it must be done at little or no cost in money. No wonder that the amusement provided by the worried pastor is too often poor stuff. No wonder if his spirit is exhausted and his words lack power. (Pp. 28-9.)

There is no lack of appreciation of devoted efforts on the part of the most various Churches, but no lack either, as we have said, of keen and searching criticism.

For instance, in the first chapter on the Church of England, the exclusiveness of the clergy is noted and the absurdity of their resentment of the "intrusion" of other workers into their parish. The range of exclusive claims varies according to the character of the clergyman, while the great divergency of teaching within the Church itself makes any such claim not only unreasonable but most difficult to enforce. And this trenchant word is added: "The unwillingness to recognise a wide field for the efforts of other branches of the Christian Church is a relic of mediævalism involving the assumption of a catholicity of observance and uniformity of opinion that are non-existent. It is a matter in which common sense overrides logic." As to the High Church Mr. BOOTH admits that its teaching produces very devoted characters of a certain kind, but the men who are attracted are not of "a strong type," and the idea that the world of men can ever be won to religion on these lines is pronounced to be "utterly untenable."

With the Congregationalist Churches Mr. BOOTH finds that "the development of the social side of religious activity attains its highest point," while great stress is laid on the power of preaching; doctrinally their tendency is said to be towards unorthodoxy and a "Christian humanitarianism." "There is very little attempt at uniformity, and in practice we find every shade represented till we reach the standpoint of Unitarianism." The Baptists are pronounced more uniformly orthodox, but it is a uniformity in respect of which we are inclined to be sceptical. A very sympathetic account is given of the Salvation Army, with the following judgment added:—

I have described the Salvation Army in its three-fold development. I have indicated the limitations to which, as a Gospel mission, it has been subjected in London, and have shown that if in this respect it has failed, it has succeeded in forming a very powerful and remarkable religious community, which lives on and in its work. Religious enthusiasm is the inspiring force of this community, and is still poured out in efforts to convert the world to the religious ideas which underlie the whole. But everywhere it turns also to social work, and this work comes to have a life of its own. Meanwhile the delusion is maintained that the world, perishing for the lack of belief in the doctrine they preach, is athirst for the Gospel expressed in their formula and typified by their flag, and that what the Army is accomplishing for the salvation of man on these lines is of the first importance. But it is not so. Whatever the value of these doctrines, the belief in them does not spread. No universality can be claimed for them. Their validity rests upon spiritual experiences, subject to various interpretations, and not common to all mankind. Nevertheless, the power of these doctrines is great with those who share their acceptation. They serve to bind men together in high aspirations and unselfish devotion, and herein lies their justification. The delusion on this subject is shared by all the Evangelical Missions, but with none has it risen to such a height as with the Salvation Army. On the other hand, it must be said that for earnest faith, strenuous work, and real self-sacrifice for the good of others, the Salvation Army stands first. (Pp. 343-4.)

If now we turn to the notice of our own churches, we are not surprised to find that in the survey of this vast field they hold only a very small place. In the chapter on Nonconformist Churches there is a section on "Presbyterians, Unitarians, Society of Friends, and others." None of these, Mr. BOOTH says, "make any claim to popularity." Most important are the Presbyterians (of the Scottish type), and then he continues:—

Unitarians, on the other hand, though impaired as religious critics by a certain narrowness of spiritual sympathy, are quite invaluable as leaders in social work. In the institution of "Domestic Missions" they were pioneers. Their work in this field dates from an even earlier period than the foundation of the Ragged School Union, and of that the scope was at first much more limited. It was not possible for the Unitarians to kindle the burning enthusiasm which Lord Shaftesbury and those who have succeeded him have roused amongst their agents, and also in the public mind, over the carrying of the Gospel to the poor while attempting to amend the conditions of their lives. The action of the Unitarians was limited on every side; in the securing of suitable workers, as well as in obtaining sufficient money, and most of all by the discovery early made, that every step taken to make matters better involved some danger of making them worse. It will, perhaps, be said that they lacked the "one thing needful"—that which Mary had and Martha had not: on this Gospel theory great experiments have been made and are yet being made, but there are none of those engaged in such attempts that might not with advantage study the work done and the experience gained by the Unitarian organisations.

As a religious body the Unitarians are small in numbers, and their numbers are still dwindling. By the orthodox their teaching is regarded, somewhat arbitrarily, as a negation, and we hear it said that "you cannot win on a negation"; but, however regarded, it does seem as though the Unitarian view of the spiritual world in its relation to men awoke little response in the human soul, comparing in this respect unfavourably with even the most extravagant assertions of any African medicine man. Although, however, their direct corporate influence on religious thought grows less rather than greater, their doctrines may be detected working afresh elsewhere, especially among the advanced sections of the Congregationalists, and they probably hold a permanent place in religious development. (Pp. 145-6).

That is a judgment which prompts to much serious thought, and there are things that we shall wish to say about it before long; but for the present we leave it for the quiet consideration of our readers, and ask them to consider with it the stimulating address by the Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED at the annual meeting of the London District Society.

LAYMEN'S CLUB.—The first general meeting and dinner of the club was held on Friday, May 8, at the Inns of Court Hotel; Dr. Herbert Smith was in the chair. The business of the evening consisted in the discussion and settlement of the rules drafted by the provisional committee, the election of officers for the ensuing year, and the election of a committee. Dr. Herbert Smith was unanimously elected president. The club is intended to promote a greater social union among gentlemen connected with the various Unitarian churches in London, and also to render assistance in the more serious works undertaken by the various centres. Particulars may be obtained from the hon. sec, W. Fitchett Wurtzburg, 3, Lawn-road, N.W.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION: COUNCIL MEETING.—From the list of members present at the Meeting on April 28 the name of Miss Preston was inadvertently omitted.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE fifty-third annual meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, when there was a large attendance of subscribers and friends, who were received by the President, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., and Lady Durning-Lawrence, the first half-hour being spent in social intercourse.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past seven, and moved the adoption of the report, but then was obliged to leave the meeting to fulfil another engagement, his place being taken by Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. The President spoke with warm appreciation of the Society's Missionary, the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, who, he was confident, was putting his soul into the work, and appealed to young men to come in and take their share of it.

Mr. G. H. CLENNELL read the Committee's Report, which after recording the appointment of the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed as Missionary Minister and Lecturer for the London District, an appointment rendered possible by the late Miss Durning Smith's bequest of £2,000, gave the following account of the final distribution of the 1900 Bazaar Fund of about £4,400.

To Deptford. £10 to pay off a small debt on the Chapel Restoration Fund.

To Forest Gate. £475 to aid the congregation to pay off a mortgage on their land.

To Highgate. £120 to aid the congregation to pay off a mortgage on their church property.

To Kentish Town. £800 to enable the congregation to establish a fund, the capital of which is available for the acquisition of the freehold of the present church, or another site on the expiration of the lease, and the income in the meantime is available to pay the rent.

To Kilburn. £510 10s. 2d. (being the final balance of the fund after the other payments had been made) in aid of the Church Building Fund.

To Lewisham. £700 to enable the congregation to establish a similar fund to the one created in favour of the Kentish Town congregation.

To Mansford Street. £500 to enable the Committee of the church and mission to establish a fund for the acquisition of the freehold of the present mission premises, the income in the meantime being available towards payment of the ground rent.

To Peckham. £90 to enable the congregation to complete their scheme for the restoration of the church.

To Plumstead. £700 to enable the congregation to pay off a mortgage on their land.

To Wood Green. £550 towards the cost of erecting their church.

In all cases the congregations, according to their means, have themselves made contributions towards the objects for which these grants have been made, such contributions amounting in all to some £1,400, and thus as a result of this special effort a total sum of over £6,000 has been devoted to the permanent better equipment of our London churches.

Particulars were then given of the progress of the newly formed congregation at Acton, and of the condition of the various assisted churches, and the report concluded with the following suggestions for new and enlarged work, which was waiting to be done:—

The ordinary income of the Society is barely sufficient to provide the financial aid required by the assisted churches, and a large permanent addition to the Society's resources is imperatively required if that "forward policy" is to be adopted which the needs of our time demand.

There are many directions in which additional resources might be employed, and as an indication merely of some of the work which could with advantage be at once undertaken, were funds forthcoming, the Committee venture to make the following suggestions:—

I. That we should aid existing churches which are not fully equipped for their work.

At Lewisham the work is manifestly crippled for want of a suitable church and schoolrooms. In a few years the lease of the present inadequate building will expire, and provision for the future—towards which the congregation has now £1,000 in hand—is a matter of urgency. At Quex-road, Kilburn, the completion of the original scheme of building is already in hand, and substantial aid should be given to secure a satisfactory result. At Plumstead and Forest Gate sites for churches stand vacant, while the congregations still work on in small church-halls.

II. That we should extend our work to new districts.

In considering new districts for our work a difficulty often arises in finding rooms suitable for experimental series of services, and the Committee have before them suggestions designed to obviate this difficulty. It is suggested that in suitable neighbourhoods sites might be bought before prices rose too high; and an iron church might be purchased to serve temporarily in one district after another. Several districts—Wimbledon, Finchley, and Barnet particularly—have been recommended by our district minister as suitable for efforts to be made at once or in the near future; and the Committee have confidence that, with the services of intelligent and devoted ministers, a great and good work might be accomplished in these and other suburbs. Doubtless such plans need careful consideration, but it is impossible to carry them out on the present resources of the Society.

In commending these suggestions to the consideration of London Unitarians, the Committee earnestly desire the practical help of all, either as subscribers to the Society's funds, or as loyal workers in their respective churches—still better as both. It is only as all are animated by true missionary spirit that we can expect our congregations, as centres of spiritual life, to thrive and multiply.

Mr. T. H. TERRY, as treasurer, presented his statement of accounts, which, with a total of £985 5s. 1d., showed an adverse balance of £48 19s.

MR. WICKSTEED'S REPORT.

The Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED then read his report, in the course of which he said:—

"The work which claims us here in London is, as I think we shall all admit, great and grave; so great, indeed, that with all our real faith we should at times be tempted to despair, were we not aware that great forces are at work on our side. But if we are to take advantage of those forces we have much foundation work to do which cannot be too seriously taken.

"London life in all its aspects is beset by certain common difficulties, whether political, social or commercial. It is one city; and no movement can exist without enormous loss and leakage that does not embrace the whole city in its operations. The great advertisers know that their appeal must be to the whole metropolitan area, and that concentration upon a single locality would be a disadvantageous expenditure of effort. Even the central theatres send out their advertisement many miles into the distant country suburbs. And most notable of all is it that the successes of London local government are to be found in the work of the great bodies such as the County Council and the School Board, which more or less completely cover the whole vast area. And yet though the localities cannot be treated separately without disastrous waste of power, they are so far removed from one another by the congestion of the great city that in many cases it takes longer to reach one suburb from another than to travel from London to Nottingham, Portsmouth or Bristol, or even in some cases than it does to reach our neighbouring country of France.

One Body and One Spirit.

"Now, notwithstanding the serious difficulties of the situation, it will be quite impossible for us ever to take the position in London's life to which our thought and work already entitle us, still less will it be possible for us to sensibly increase and develop our movement to fuller life and usefulness until we are amongst ourselves far more of a conscious and mutually dependent unity than we have ever been in London hitherto. Until we realise that the interests of one are the interests of the whole, and still more, that the interests of the whole are the vital interests of each, every local movement will be and must remain, compared with its intrinsic worth—a cripple. We cannot be strong, we cannot be healthy, we cannot possess ourselves until we are conscious of possessing and being possessed by each other.

"But here a word of caution is necessary. No merely outward system of organisation can do us deep or lasting good. For myself, I incline to think it worse than nothing—for the tendency of such outward organisation is to produce uniformity rather than unity. Now uniformity so far from inducing a true unity is, as I believe, the very antithesis which makes true unity impossible, for we cannot be a true unity if we are all the same. There is one body, says St. Paul, and many members, and he might have put it even more strongly and said, There is one body and therefore many members, one spirit and therefore diversities of gifts. For if the whole body were feet there would be no body and no unity. If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling—but God tempered the body together, that the members should have the same care one for another. But surely it is idle and worse than idle for our churches to use one hymn-book or one liturgy, to have one system of raising income or one type of Sunday and week-day activity. All this might reduce us to outward uniformity, but unless it was a spontaneous and inevitable development from within it would be the death-blow to our deeper unity—which is at present, thank God, a reality that even our differences and our disputes serve only the deeper to reveal and emphasise. No! we must zealously guard our diversities of gifts and our diversities of tongues even at the price of preserving for some time to come our diversities of helps and our diversities of governments. But—(and if we forget this, our hope is vain) all these worketh the one and the same Spirit, dividing to each one severally even as it will. Differences are evil and not good unless they express, and are harmonised in the same spirit. And in order that the common spirit may grow, that it may be brought to fuller consciousness and organise its channels of corporate life and energy we must know each other, not as scattered acquaintances citizens of an immeasurable city, but as near friends, as kinsmen in the faith, as intimate and indispensable members one of another.

The True Spirit of Life.

"Little group as we are, of kindred thinkers and aspirers, we ought to know one another with an intimacy comparable to that of the disciples themselves, in whose Galilean intercourse the foundations were laid of the mighty Christian Church of the ages. For, mark this! Men will become liberal thinkers without our aid. They will throw over the restraints of orthodoxy without any preaching from us. The question is whether they shall find amongst us a spiritual home, a spiritual atmosphere, a spiritual brotherhood, warm with the breath of devotion and deeply conscious of its membership one of another. Are we to be a mere school of thinkers with certain common traditions of worship and life or a living conscious body, which, like St. Paul's mystic body of Christ, may become the living nucleus of organisation for the Kingdom of Heaven among men—a body in which those whose thought has led them out of the anachronisms of orthodoxy shall find the glow of fellowship for the soul as well as meat and drink for the mind? It has been my earnest hope and steadfast purpose, to make my ministry a means, in the first place, of awakening, if it can be awakened, that deeper sense of unity amongst us, upon which I believe our usefulness, and indeed our very existence, in the future depends."

The London Letter.

Mr. Wicksteed then described the particular efforts he had made to this end, and in the first place the London Letter, by means of which, gratuitously distributed from month to month, he hoped that knowledge of the different churches, their doings, their needs, their sufferings and their rejoicings, might be shared by all alike. The issue of the letter was now suspended until the autumn, but when it again appeared he trusted that the churches would make fuller use of that organ of intercommunion, and he invited suggestions towards adapting it to greater usefulness. In some form, he urged, such a medium ought to exist.

"We cannot be strong unless we are united; we cannot be united unless we are intimate, and without some common medium of intercourse all our own we cannot, as it seems to me, ever come to know each other as we ought—nay, as we must, if we are to continue alive."

Acquaintance with the Churches.

He then spoke of the great pleasure he had found in getting to know the widely scattered constituency of the district, and the uniformly cordial welcome he had received. From among the twenty-seven churches strictly within the metropolitan area he had during the seven and a-half months of his ministry already preached by invitation from fifteen pulpits, and had lectured or spoken by invitation in the schools or chapels of nine other congregations as well as in six of those already mentioned, while from each of the remaining three he had received at least one pressing invitation, which he had not as yet been able to accept. A very friendly response had also been made to another effort of his to obtain a general survey of the numbers in the chapels and schools Sunday by Sunday and week by week. He had received nearly ninety such monthly reports from twenty-four churches, with what he considered very satisfactory results—sometimes, indeed, the numbers at the services were very small; but on the other hand, the week-night activities showed great vigour and usefulness.

The Laymen's Club.

Another successful effort, making for closer union among the members of the churches, was the establishment of the Laymen's Club, the inaugural dinner of which, on the invitation of their President, had been held on Feb. 13, and the second dinner on Friday, the 8th inst., when a constitution for the Club was adopted and its future conduct discussed. 'It is too early as yet," he said, "to prophesy what may come out of such an institution, but at all events it is safe to say that some good must inevitably come from the periodic gathering together of young men who have in common certain great religious thoughts and traditions, who share in common the life of a great city, but whom the mere difficulties of space have hitherto kept in comparative isolation and estrangement."

District Society and Provincial Assembly.

Having spoken of the happiness he found in ministering to the little pioneer congregation at Acton, which secured for him that firm background and support which every minister engaged in far-reaching schemes ought to find in his own particular church, where members were knit together by the ties of spiritual worship, which are of the very essence of a living church, Mr. Wicksteed bore testimony to the cordiality of his relations as district minister of the London Unitarian Society with those who represented the London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly, and especially to the support and fellowship of his intercourse with the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the Assembly's District Minister.

"Doubtless," he said, "as in most other matters of opinion amongst Unitarians, each of us has his own particular theory as to the true relations between such a Society and such an Assembly, and for the most part we shall each of us be ready to leave every other to his own particular error. And if it is not out of place to take this opportunity of venting my own particular heresy, it is to regard our Unitarian Society as a member, nay, I will say more, as an organ of the wider-reaching assembly. Putting aside the question of historical precedence—surely all must admit that a body whose administration included in its sphere so enormous a feature as London, would do wisely to appoint a powerful and independent commission to administer this portion of its area. Such an independent and permanent commission I look upon our District Society as constituting, and I would add—although here I am aware that I tread on controversial ground, and therefore give my opinion with considerable reserve—that it would further be wise in such a field as we have in London for that permanent London Commission to be worked upon definitely, though not narrowly, doctrinal lines which characterise our work in one of its aspects.

The Need of Explicit Teaching.

"Amidst the din and confusion of London life only those voices can command attention which speak in no faltering or ambiguous tones. To tell each man that he must by the sweat of his brow find his own truth for himself is a noble ideal of which we must never lose sight. But it is not milk for babes. And unless we can so speak as to make it indisputably clear that our freedom has resulted in our finding something which, whatever it may be for others, is most potently true for ourselves, the multitude will not wait to listen, and the profounder and subtler analysis of the light which has brought us bliss will remain by them unheeded and unloved.

"Let me be explicit then. We are Unitarians, who believe in one essential creative Power, as the greatest Greeks and the Hebrew prophets believed. We are Unitarians, who believe in one essential human nature, the same in Jesus as in all other men, both human and divine. We are Unitarians, who believe that truth is one, the same for science as for religion, and must in all fields be sought with the same unflinching fidelity to the great rational principles of all thought, and we would humbly endeavour ever fearlessly to carry our reasoning faculty exact and alert into the still deeps of our deepest devotion. I say let us be explicit and teach these things with unfaltering voice, but even so we must not rest until our Unitarianism has taught us, and those who have listened to us, that the same Almighty power which has given us this vision for our joy and our charge, is that which shines and has shone in the divers faiths of countless differing souls, and upon whatsoever grounds our own particular faith may rest, let our communion be based upon the divine light within, the Holy Spirit in man, however primitive or weak—nay, in animal and plant and the very suns of heaven, God in whom all has its being and its joy."

With a word of thankfulness to the officers and committee the report concluded:—

"May the goodness of God be in our hearts as we set forth again on a new year of endeavour, and may the blessing of His light crown the work of our hearts and of our hands."

Mr. H. G. Chancellor seconded the adoption of the reports, which had been moved by the President before he left the meeting. He spoke of the active self-help manifested by the congregations at Lewisham and Stepney, and urged that more might be done to promote friendly intercourse between different congregations on lines adopted formerly by a North London committee, which had proved very successful. He also advocated more liberal advertising as due to the public, to whom the truth we had to declare ought to be made known.

The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, supported the motion, and speaking as President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, said that his Society and theirs were working on the same lines. He was always deeply impressed when he came to London with the vastness of that great population, and the huge circumference within which it stood. They had an immense task to carry out their operations within that great area. It must seem as if what they could do was almost nothing,—those little congregations scattered over that huge population. Yet they must not look upon their work in the light of the vastness of London, but of the value of the work itself, which was immense. They touched and influenced little groups of people, and that influence would pass from one to another; so they might be assured that in God's sight they were touching the great life of that vast population. He had been much interested in Mr. Wicksteed's delightful and earnest address, and particularly in what he said of the body and its members, of unity rather than uniformity, of organism living and growing rather than manufactured organisation. The difference there might be in the background of their mind between those greatly interested in that Society and those greatly interested in the Provincial Assembly was the same as that in regard to the larger Associations covering the whole country. Yet he felt certain that theoretical difficulties always melted away in practical work, without any dereliction of principle whatever. The fact was that in Unitarianism there was one inherent and uncontrollable tendency towards freedom of life and inspiration, and there was also in ecclesiastical freedom an inherent and uncontrollable tendency in the direction of Unitarianism, so that the two things necessarily, in spite of all demonstration that they had nothing to do with one another, came together and intertwined and worked shoulder to shoulder together. He expressed the deepest interest in their work, and told how great a help the acquisition of an iron church for missionary use in the Liverpool district had proved. Money could be always got, the great need was of men. There was any amount of work to do, any amount of opportunity, and of money also. The one thing wanted in greater abundance was men of the type of their missionary, earnest, thoughtful men, full of religious life and self-sacrificing ardour. If they could breed such men in their congregations, there was no greatness to which they could not attain in the years to come.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, as chairman of committee, added a few words of cordial sympathy with Mr. Wicksteed in his work, and the resolution was passed.

On the motion of Mr. Clennell, seconded by Mr. H. Epps, a modification of Rule V. as to officers and committee was passed, and the officers were then elected, on the motion of the Rev. W. C. Pope, seconded by Mr. Alfred Clarke. Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., is the new president, and there are fourteen vice-presidents. Treasurer and secretaries were re-elected.

Mr. J. Fretwell then moved, and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards seconded, the appointment of the committee, with Mr. Tarrant as chairman, a rider being added on the motion of Mr. A. Titford, seconded by Mr. H. Stannus, to the effect that the committee of fifteen should co-opt other members to make up the number to twenty.

Mr. Ronald Bartram proposed a resolution condemning the Education Bill for London, on the ground that it abolished the School Board, excluded women from their rightful share of control, and established religious tests for a large number of masterships in State-supported schools.

Mr. STANNUS objected as a point of order to the resolution, of which no notice had been given, though he entirely agreed with its terms, and urged that a special meeting should be called to deal with the matter and give the resolution the greater weight.

The CHAIRMAN having ruled that the resolution was not in order, a vote of thanks to him, moved by Mr. TERRY, and seconded by Mr. CLENNELL, brought the meeting to a close.

WESTERN UNION ANNUAL ASSEMBLY.

THE annual assembly of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches was held at Tavistock on Wednesday, May 6.

The proceedings commenced with the annual business meeting, held in the forenoon in the Abbey Chapel, and presided over by Mr. E. J. BLAKE, of Crewkerne.

The Rev. T. W. Chignell, of Exeter, apologising for unavoidable absence, sent a letter in which he said:—

You remember how the elders of Troy sat upon the tower of the Scæan gate, and took no part in the battle because they were old, yet their words and their ripeness of judgment caused them still to be revered among the fighting hosts. So sit I, looking from far on the battle. Fortunate should I be if some of the old men's gifts still linger upon me. I wish I could hear some of the living words that will be spoken amongst you to-morrow; and that I myself could have spoken a few words of encouragement to those among you who know what it is to be stirred in their inmost souls, and who have the courage to obey the divinest voices that come to man.

Ministers and delegates were present from Bath, Bridgwater, Bridport, Bristol, Colyton, Crediton, Crewkerne, Cullompton, Devonport, Exeter, Frenchay, Gloucester, Moretonhampstead, Newton Abbot, Plymouth, Trowbridge, Tavistock, Taunton, and Torquay.

The committee's report stated that the retrospect of the past year was marked by the evidences of faithful and satisfactory work in various localities throughout the district. Sincere satisfaction was expressed at the recovery of the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, the district minister, from the illness which some time ago caused a temporary withdrawal from his labours; and hearty welcomes were given to the Rev. G. Leonard Phelps, of Christ Church, Devonport, and the Rev. Alfred Amey, Colyton. The present position of the former Church was such as to justify strong hopes of real and sustained progress. In conjunction with the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, a substantial increase had been made in the amount of aid offered to the friends at Devonport, and it was satisfactory that the Devonport congregation had responded to the encouragement thus given. Congratulations were offered by the committee to the congregation and its energetic young minister. The committee testified to the kindly consideration uniformly extended to their suggestions by the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The friends of Crediton deserved congratulations upon their efforts. The report concluded by stating that the testimonies of faithfulness among the members of their small and widely-scattered household of faith were most encouraging; and by directing attention to the balance-sheet, which showed an adverse balance.

On the motion of Major-General JACOB, seconded by Mr. C. H. TRUMAN, the report and financial statement were adopted.

Several delegates spoke in acknowledgment of the valuable services rendered by lay preachers. The PRESIDENT also added a word of testimony to the great help given by those gentlemen, and expressed thanks to them for their past services.

Mr. W. WHITFORD proposed and the Rev. A. LANCASTER seconded the election of the officers and committee of the Union for the ensuing year:—The Rev. W. Lloyd being elected president; Mr. P. J. Worsley, J.P., hon. treasurer; Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., and the Rev. J. McDowell, hon. secretaries; and the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A., hon. Sunday-school secretary.

Grants were then voted to various congregations in the district, and the Rev. J. McDOWELL was appointed representative of the district on the Triennial Conference Committee.

The Rev. R. C. DENDY proposed a hearty vote of thanks to the Revs. W. G. Tarrant and G. Leonard Phelps for their services as preacher and supporter that day.

The Rev. J. BARRON, in seconding, expressed the pleasure of the Tavistock congregation that the Assembly had met in that town, and said that he hoped their gatherings would be very successful.

A hearty welcome was also accorded Mr. Tarrant as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT said that he had been a member of the British and Foreign Committee for sixteen years, and could therefore speak confidently of the spirit which animated that work. The policy of the Association was to do all its work through the district associations. The executive committee looked to those district associations to report as to the best way of applying the means placed in the hands of the treasurer. That was done with an eye to using the resources of the Association fairly and properly. It had been the wish of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to have a missionary—not a pastor-at-large—to go where there were no churches, in large towns and crowded urban and rural districts, to spread their gospel far and wide. He was amazed to find the number of counties in which they had no representative assembly. Referring to the recent large increase in the resources of the Association, he said it was primarily for "new and extended work"; but they might rely upon continued help, and he was sure that the Committee would be glad, as far as means would allow, to make grants for restoration purposes.

Mr. P. J. WORSLEY proposed and the Rev. J. WORTHINGTON seconded a vote of thanks to Mr. Blake as president, not only for his chairmanship that day, but also for the counsel and aid which he had so generously and constantly afforded to the Union. The seconder also referred to the good services rendered to the cause by Major-General Jacob.

The PRESIDENT, in acknowledging the vote of thanks, said that his great grandfather settled in Crewkerne 140 years ago, and his great grandfather and his grandfather conducted the services at the chapel there for 70 years.

Major-General JACOB expressed his thanks for the reference which had been made to himself. Although a young recruit as a Unitarian, he was, as they knew, a very old recruit in connection with the Army, and in fact his views had changed long ago, but when he was in India he had no chance of joining a Unitarian Church. He had joined it some years ago, and he hoped to go on with the good work of helping that little congregation in the future as he had in the past.

LUNCHEON.

Luncheon was held in the Town Hall, under the presidency of Major-General JACOB. Among those present were the ministers and delegates who had attended the conference, Mr. J. Hill, J.P., chairman of the Urban Council; Mr. W. Winney, ex-chairman of the Council; the Rev. F. T. Astbury, Congregational minister, and members of the various denominations in the town.

"The King" having been proposed by the CHAIRMAN, and duly honoured,

Mr. A. S. HARRIS, J.P., of Plymouth, submitted the toast of "Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over."

The Rev. W. LLOYD, of Gloucester, president-elect, in acknowledging the toast, said that he did not know if there was any other body of religious people, presumably Nonconformists, in the country, who still honoured this toast as he presumed the Dissenters did in the eighteenth century. Then, whatever might be their theological views, grievances, or differences he believed all the Nonconformists were united in their determination to secure for themselves and for everybody else civil and religious liberty, and the result of that we reaped to-day. We were enjoying in England a measure of civil and religious liberty that was only paralleled by our brethren across the Atlantic. They too had derived their civil and religious liberty from those from whom we had also derived it—the Nonconformists of early times. He knew that some people thought that Unitarians were peculiar people, but they were only peculiar in this, that they went the whole length of their convictions. Most people were lovers of liberty, and most people were afraid of too much of it. There were some of their Nonconformist friends, who perhaps thought that they in their liberty as Unitarians had gone a little too far. They had only carried the principle a little bit further than their friends had carried it. The clergy were largely Nonconformists in the Church; they were Nonconformists out of the Church. Some of the clergy admitted that there was not much difference between them, only the Unitarians said things that the clergy could not say. Money, pleasure, fame, patronage—if they had to sacrifice their liberty for these they were not worth having.

Mr. P. J. WORSLEY, J.P., in the name of the Western Union, offered their entertainers at Tavistock hearty thanks for the generous and kind hospitality with which they had received them. He said coming down to this neighbourhood reminded him that things were not always so happy. At Tavistock the congregation flourished under, he would not say the fostering care, but under the liberal principles of the House of Russell. To the kindness of that House they owed the chapel (the refectory of the ancient Abbey), and, practically, permission to carry on Nonconformist and Presbyterian services in days when to do so was attended with difficulty. He mentioned that he was a descendant of George Hughes, the Vicar of St. Andrews, Plymouth, who in 1662 was one of those men who when called on to make the Declaration of Uniformity refused, like some thousands of others, to sign it. He was imprisoned in the island of St. Nicholas, and kept there until he died. When they remembered the death of that man they could rejoice in their liberty. The ring on his finger belonged to Mr. Hughes. In the name of the Western Union he offered their Tavistock friends hearty thanks for their generous hospitality.

The Chairman begged on behalf of the congregation at Tavistock to tender their very best thanks for the kind way in which Mr. Worsley had spoken of them. It was a great pleasure to them to entertain their friends. When he saw The Inquirer and the Christian Life the most interesting part to him was the news of the churches. It gave him the very greatest pleasure to see how they were getting on, to see how one place was building a church, another building an extra wing, and so on. But if it was a great pleasure to read of the churches, it was a far greater pleasure to meet the members personally as they did on that occasion. They hoped that there were those present who would go back to their chapels with a renewed vigour, and that they would be encouraged to persevere in their good work. He thought that Unitarianism was a grand cause because it placed before them truth above everything else, and there was no religion higher than truth. The second point that made their Church such a good one was that its worship was a rational worship. There was no dogma about it to offend anyone at all. It was the pure and simple worship of Almighty God. The third point, which followed as a matter of course, was that there was a sincerity in it which they could not get in a religion if they did not believe all its dogmas. When hearing the Athanasian and other creeds he used to say to himself, "Can it possibly be true that if I don't believe this I am going to be everlastingly damned?" He said to himself "No." He had never had greater pleasure than since he had joined their little congregation at Tavistock.

Mr. J. Hill, J.P., a member of the Congregationalist Church, said that as a humble representative of the historic little town of Tavistock it gave him very great pleasure to welcome their friends that day. It was gratifying to see that their loyalty to their cause was of such a character that most of them had travelled a great many miles to sit together around the festive board and to be refreshed in another way in their little temple yonder. He should like to pay a tribute to his friend Mr. Blatchford, and he knew also their friend Major-General Jacob, whom he respected for the sincerity of his convictions. To leave the Established Church, and to fasten his faith on those principles of liberty which had been so beautifully touched upon by their friend Mr. Lloyd, showed that a man must have passed through many mental fires to take such a stand, and all glory to the man who could take such a stand. He did not see why the Unitarian body should be regarded as outsiders by other Christian churches. They could not disguise the fact that in the past that had been so, but he was proud to see at that gathering representatives from the Church of England, the Wesleyan, and the Congregational Churches. The inhabitants of Tavistock congratulated themselves on being a liberty-loving town. Any candidate for municipal or Parliamentary honours, if not animated by the principles which had been so ably dwelt upon that day, if not ready to study the interests of the people whether in respect to the Education Act or any other question, would not have the slightest chance of representing the town or the division. Nonconformists were not to be slighted or insulted. They claimed their rights and they were going to have them. There were many people who were outside the Unitarian Church who ought to be in it, and who would be in it if they had the courage of their convictions. "The slave is he who feels not the chain that galls another, and a greater slave is he who will not be freed."

The Rev. A. N. Blatchford, whom the Chairman called upon, remarked that the associations which crowded on one's heart as well as on one's mind on such an occasion as that made it very difficult to adequately express one's feelings. No place in all the world could ever be to him what Tavistock was. He would not enlarge on those things now. He only thanked from his heart the previous speaker for the kind words which had fallen from him. Suffice it to say that it was a joy to him when the generous hearts representing the Tavistock congregation found themselves able to say to the members of the Western Union "Come down and hold your assembly in our town." He responded to all that had been so well said with regard to Tavistock, with its associations of liberty. One remembered with pride how in the old days Tavistock again and again sent up the heroic John Pym to Parliament, and one had thought from time to time of the liberalising influence of the Russell family through not only the political, but the religious world as well. There were records in the transactions of the town which redounded in the highest degree to the credit and to the true nobility of the House of Bedford. Thomas Larkham, when he came to form a church, found a defender in one of the gracious Countesses of Russell, who placed at his disposal and those who worshipped with him the Abbey Chapel in which they were worshipping that day. He could only say how grateful he was to be in Tavistock again and to offer his heartfelt wishes for the success of a cause there, which he believed would be supported by the earnest and true ones of to-day, as it was by those courageous ones who bore up the flag in the olden time and spoke without fear and reproach. Might the remembrance of that liberty and faith be a guiding light to them, and might they hand on to their children the self-same love of liberty and of simple veracity which characterised their fathers and their mothers in the days gone by.

PUBLIC SERVICE.

In the afternoon a large congregation assembled for worship in the Abbey Chapel. The devotional part of the service was entrusted to the Rev. G. Leonard Phelps, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., of Wandsworth, from 2 Tim. i. 6, 7: "I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God which is in thee through the laying on of my hands. For God gave us not a spirit of fearfulness, but of power and love and discipline." Having referred to the noble men of the past whose hands were laid upon them, consecrating them to their work, the preacher observed that it was sometimes said that it took courage to be a Unitarian. It took courage to be a heretic at any time. That day he was not pleading so much for a special "ism" as for a principle which made men true in all ages. If it took courage to be a Unitarian, let him mould that phrase in another form and say that if a man had true courage he would not be found far from the Kingdom of God in the sense in which Unitarians thought they had found it. The first Unitarians were men of "The Book." They dared to read the Bible with open hearts and open eyes, and because they could not find in it the doctrines which men professed to base on it they were compelled in virtue of their trust in God to speak out the conclusions to which they came, though men seized them, put them under severe disabilities, imprisoned them, and in many cases put them to cruel torture and to death. Without such souls how could truth spread? As the years went on their protest came to be heard more and more, and to-day if they were to search the churches through he did not hesitate to say that they would find many who would say with them that the Bible as it stood was not sufficient for the basis of the doctrines which were commonly called Trinitarian. There were also many who had become heretics and were numbered with Unitarians not because they had searched the written record, but a record nearer to them than any Bible could be—something written in their heart. How many thousands there were who would fain trust that record against the things that they had been taught to believe! Did men really believe all that was said about hell? Having pictured the anxiety and rush of any humane person to save a child in danger of a horrible death from burning, the speaker said that if men really believed in fire unquenchable to be endured for ever by the vast majority of the human race they ought at all times, with tears in their eyes, to be beseeching their fellows to avert it. Some had tried to believe this, but a voice higher than priests or creeds had spoken to them boldly against it. That voice was the spirit of love. Unitarians trusted to the primal consciousness of the child, who knew his father better than to believe that such things could be. They could never accept that doctrine. There were signs of a springtide coming in this their true and liberal faith. Might God speed the coming of His kingdom!

PUBLIC MEETING.

Tea was provided at the Town Hall, where, in the evening, a largely attended public meeting was held, under the presidency of Mr. Edward J. Blake, of Crewkerne, who congratulated the assembly on the fact that the day's proceedings had been in every way successful. They wanted, it seemed to him, to go back to what was the religion of Christ. They did not want so many dogmas and creeds. Christ never taught them, but he taught man his duty towards God and his neighbour. The teaching of Christ ought to be practised in the lives of the people of the present day as far as possible. He was often asked what was Unitarianism. A simple definition would be that Unitarians believed in a loving God, that God was one, and they regarded Christ as man, looking to him as leader, guide, and teacher.

The Rev. Walter Lloyd said Unitarians insisted on no doctrines in the ordinary sense, and no dogmas imposed by authority. They could learn from science or history without coming into conflict with their religion. The Christian religion was to love God with all their hearts, minds, souls, and strength, and their neighbours as themselves. History and science had nothing to say against that. In fact, there was no conflict between science and religion. There was a conflict between science and theology, and a still greater conflict between theology and religion. Unitarians had to get rid of the things in theology which encumbered the spirit, and interfered with the spirit of religion and the development of our higher nature.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant emphasised the extent of the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the fact that there were many people holding the same views as they did, but who did not call themselves by the same name.

The Rev. J. McDowell and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford also gave interesting addresses.

On the invitation of Major-General Jacob, the Ministers' Conference, at which a paper by the Rev. G. L. Phelps, on "The Minister out of the Pulpit," was read and discussed, was held on the following morning, at Brooklands, where the ministers were subsequently entertained at dinner by their host.

Thus closed one of the happiest and most encouraging gatherings in the records of our Western churches.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plynlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

STUDIES IN THEOLOGY.

By J. ESTLIN CARPENTER and P. H. WICKSTEED. Demy 8vo, 5/- net.

The Daily News says:—
"In most of these studies we are dealing with fundamentals; not the questions that divide different theistic religions, but the great unanswered problems that have fretted mankind since the dawn of history. . . . In the work of both authors there is wide reading, clear utterance, and a readiness to face the fundamental questions."

The Manchester Guardian says:—
"A number of essays and lectures of real value. . . . The collaboration strikes us as distinctly happy, and the result is a volume with an underlying unity of aim which is likely to attract a good many readers by the freshness with which some of the living problems of religious thought are handled."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN this Emerson Centenary number of THE INQUIRER, in addition to the leading article and some notes on English editions of Emerson, the following articles are included :—

Emerson the Man, by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

Emerson's Inspiration for Religion, by the Rev. W. J. Jupp.

Emerson's Theism, by Professor Upton.

The Divinity School Address, by the Rev. Henry Gow.

Hours with Emerson, by the Rev. Walter Lloyd.

An Emerson Children's Column, by Miss F. E. Cooke.

We had hoped to include also an article on "Emerson in England," as well as "Emerson's 'Conduct of Life,'" by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, and "Representative Men" by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, but these we are obliged to hold over until next week.

THE Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., who is to preach the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whit-week, arrived in Liverpool last week, with Mrs. Crooker, after a pleasant crossing in the s.s. Saxonia, from Boston. On Sunday morning Dr. Crooker preached in Hope-street Church, the service being conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. He spoke at the outset of the profound emotion with which he stood in that pulpit, where "those lyric thoughts respecting God and man, life and immortality, were breathed forth from the master mind of James Martineau," and where the voices of other "prophets of the spirit," among them W. H. Channing and their present minister, had been heard. The sermon was on the preaching of Jesus to "the spirits in prison," and Dr. Crooker eloquently contrasted the older conceptions of life with the modern, and showed how the new interpretation of Jesus brought him very near to us, and opened new visions of the spiritual life, with deliverance through the power of love and a glorified humanity from all that is evil and the fear of death.

THE London Education Bill was taken in Committee on Monday, and by Wednesday night had proceeded as far as the second clause. It was hoped, oversanguinely, that by that time the measure would have passed this stage. Surely there never was so gross a miscalculation in connection with a Bill of such importance. Sir William Anson has adhered to his plan of keeping the borough councils "in the Bill," but their representatives are to be only twelve and the London County Council is to have a clear majority. The question of the local management of the schools is of the utmost importance, but at present it is difficult to see what solution of this problem will be accepted by the Government. Mr. Balfour does not appear to have made up his mind on the subject with anything like the definiteness to be looked for in a responsible statesman. It is much to be hoped that he will be finally impressed by the arguments in favour of keeping as much as possible of the uniformity of regulations now in force under the Board.

THE debates have elicited good speeches in criticism of the Bill, not only from the Opposition, but from notable supporters of the Government on ordinary occasions. Mr. Tritton, Mr. Cripps, Sir John Gorst, and Mr. Middlemore have thus distinguished themselves; but what is more remarkable is the fact that hardly a word has been said ex animo in support of the Bill from the Ministerial side, except (if it be an exception) by official persons. It has been clear that the body of Ministerialists have no love for the measure—the Government majority sank to forty-one in a critical division; but the London voluntary schools must be cared for, the London School Board must be killed, and the Irish vote is safe. So the work has gone wearily on, without enthusiasm on the one side, and with profound disgust on the other. On Saturday afternoon (to-day) there is to be a great demonstration in Hyde Park against the Bill; but we presume that Mr. Balfour, like Gallio, cares for none of these things.

BY a singular and suggestive coincidence each of the three great branches of Congregational church polity in this country has been considering, at its May meetings, the desirability of revising its methods, and of adapting its constitution to the needs of largely changed conditions. Baptists, Independents, and our own Liberal Christian churches—or, as Mr. Armstrong prefers, our Free Catholic Church—have alike felt that their machinery is somewhat antiquated, that the old Individualism needs the correcting and counterbalancing force of a new conception of fellowship, and, in fact, that the new wine of a new age needs pouring into new bottles. In each the same problem presents itself, how to preserve the freedom and autonomy of the separate church, and at the same time secure a more vital cohesion and a more active and definite union of the parts in order that they may make a whole. Dr. Horton, the chairman of the Congregational Union, boldly faced the situation in his address on "Congregationalism and the Catholic Church." He reminded his hearers that the question of organisation had been raised two years ago by Dr. Parker. His own address dealt specifically with a question underlying organisation—their conception of a Christian Church. From our own point of view we should find, were we so disposed, something to criticise in two or three portions of Dr. Horton's clear and powerful presentation of the Congregational ideal. We prefer to dwell on those portions of his address with which we are in cordial agreement, and which illustrate our own position and effort at the present moment.

REFERRING to the rise of Congregationalism in the sixteenth century Dr. Horton asks: "Did our fathers assert the rights of the independent congregations in order to leave them disconnected? Did they work for disintegration, or was their disintegration only a step to a nobler integration?" We are not so sure that the answer is as clear as Dr. Horton implies. They went out, they knew not whither; they did not, could not, see the end of the movement then begun. The nobler integration had to wait until mere separatism had run its course. What we are witnessing now are the birth-throes of integration. "We are agitated by a divine unrest. Our Congregational churches are moving towards a closer unity." Something of value may be learned from the other great Protestant churches without renouncing the Congregational ideal. "Our effort to improve or complete our organisation is a dumb confession that we yearn after some things which we have not and other churches possess. We should not like to say that we desire Episcopacy, or Presbyterianism, or even Methodism, but no one can study the schemes which have been set before us without seeing that we covet the substance of these systems, the connection, the unity, the power of concerted action, the ability to occupy the central slums of the city and the sparsely-populated districts of the country, the proper guardianship of the entrance to the ministry, and the equalised sustenance of the ministers who are permitted to enter." This language sounds almost like an echo from our own Conference. Followed as it was by the Committee's large scheme for the reconstruction of the Union, with the view of welding the individual churches into a Church, able to act and speak as one body, this language marks an epoch in the history of Congregationalism.

The Committee's scheme for the reconstruction of the Union, of which we gave a short account in a previous issue, was introduced by Dr. Barrett, in a quiet but statesmanlike speech. The scheme briefly is a working compromise between those who desire a larger collective action of the churches through their closer confederation, and those who regard with watchful jealousy the least infringement of the freedom and independency of the individual church. Self-government is secured in all that affects the internal affairs of each little community, while the more collective life and action is entirely free from doctrinal tests and conditions. At the same time it is frankly recognised that there are duties and obligations which belong to the churches as a whole rather than to any one church, and which can only be effectively discharged when those churches are confederated into an organic and living union. Among these duties and obligations are church aid, the maintenance of the ministry, the co-ordination, and, in some cases, amalgamation, of the colleges, the settlement and removal of ministers, and generally the bringing of various and often overlapping funds into harmonious working. Into the details of the Executive Council of 300, with its various committees, we need not enter, since they will doubtless undergo considerable amendment before the end is in sight. The whole scheme is now referred to the churches and the various county unions for criticism, and will not be finally decided until the autumnal session of 1904. The probability is that the general principles will be heartily accepted, but that there will be a good deal of fighting over details. One thing is clear: our friends do not expect that new machinery will give them new life; they recognise fully that life will create its own machinery; and that, they tell us, is exactly the secret of the movement for a closer and a better organisation of their forces. It is the life which is in them striving and seeking to give itself more adequate expression.

Orders have been received by Mr. Philip Green for some five hundred copies of the reprint of the National Conference Proceedings beyond the thousand copies that were printed, and we do not yet know whether the Conference Committee will feel justified in printing a further edition, as the 3d. charged for the book is very far from covering the cost. The postage of this threepenny book is 2d., and two copies can be posted for 3d. Friends who have ordered single copies should pay this postage, as well as the net price of the book.

Several items of News and other Matter unavoidably held over until next week.

OBITUARY.

MISS E. M. BADLAND.

On Tuesday, May 5, Miss Emma Margaret Badland, Shortheath, Kidderminster, passed peacefully away in a ripe old age of ninety-one years. An accident last December twelve month proved to be the real beginning of the end. She remained in full possession of her faculties up to the last, and retained a strong interest in everything that went on in the world around her, particularly in denominational and political matters. She was a staunch Unitarian and was connected with the New Meeting House, Kidderminster, all her life, her ancestors having been connected with it almost from its foundation. For many years she, with her sister, the late Mrs. Hughes, of Wood Setton, took a very active interest in the girls' Sunday-school, teaching her class as well as superintending the school. Hers was a sunny nature filled with an optimism which sprang from a firm faith that the Good was the more powerful and was bound to conquer, and this made her faith in human nature strong. She would regret the clouds if any came to darken the firmament, but she made the best of things, always gave a word of encouragement, was a peacemaker, and spoke a good word whenever she could do so. She reached a remarkable age, and until her accident was a regular attendant at the Sunday morning services. A long life, so lived and so ended, can leave only memories of thankfulness and peace, turned not towards the shadows, but to the light of the new day.

Miss Badland was buried at the Old Cemetery, Kidderminster, the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans officiating there and at a memorial service held in the chapel on the following Sunday morning.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. Letters cannot be inserted without the writer's name; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS IN LONDON.

Sir,—May I be allowed to direct the attention of your readers to the Anniversary Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which promise to be of exceptional interest this year? Tickets for the lecture by Mr. Augustine Birrell on "Emerson" on Tuesday evening, June 2, should be applied for without delay so as to prevent disappointment. Tickets for the conversazione should also be secured in good time so that there may be the same large and delightful gathering as on previous years. The sermon by Dr. Crooker at Little Portland Street Chapel is on Wednesday morning. At the business meeting in the afternoon several important questions will be discussed. The speeches at the public meeting in the evening will cover a variety of interesting topics. At the conference on Thursday morning, Miss M. B. Westenholz, whom many will remember in connection with the meetings of the International Council, will read a paper dealing with "The World-Mission of Unitarianism," while Mr. J. C. Warren will introduce a discussion of Home needs and opportunities. Miss G. von Petzold, Mrs. C. A. Ginever (née Miss Gyory) and the Rev. J. Hocart will speak on Foreign work, the Rev. James C. Street and others on Home work.

Ministers from the country who have sent word not later than May 20 that they require hospitality will be provided for. Tickets for the Emerson lecture and the conversazione will be forwarded to all ministers and delegates from the country who return their forms on or before May 26.

I shall be glad to hear from London Unitarians willing to offer hospitality to ministers attending the meetings. I shall also be glad to receive the names of any ladies or gentlemen in London or the country prepared to join the choir at the religious service, when Mr. John Harrison will preside at the organ.

The Committee have provided an interesting, instructive, and varied programme, and they trust that the members and supporters of the Association from far and near will attend in great force.

W. Copeland Bowie, Secretary.

Essex Hall, London, May 20.

THE DANGER OF TYRANNY.

Sir,—I am most anxious to avoid newspaper controversy on the questions of policy now before our churches, and to pull heartily together with those who desire a closer brotherhood amongst us. I therefore pass by what appear to me my friend Mr. Lummis's strangely chosen instances of ecclesiastical organisations which have not exercised suppression or oppression. Indeed, of the Midland Christian Union I am not able to speak.

But Mr. Lummis goes on to speak of "the body which has already grasped the reins of Church government"; and it is clear that he refers to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. This charge has been hinted and suggested before, but usually so vaguely and indefinitely as to be difficult to meet. But Mr. Lummis always has the courage of his opinions and says exactly what he means. I am sure, therefore, that he will willingly explain on what facts he bases his most grave statement, and in what manner the Unitarian Association has, in his view, "grasped the reins." I am convinced that all those concerned in the management of the Association's affairs will be grateful for a plain statement of the grounds of the allegation.

THE NEW HYMN AND TUNE BOOK.

Sir,—Mr. Harwood may ease his mind The use of the word "Conference" in the designation of the New Hymn and Tune Book was a slip of the pen for which I apologise to anyone who feels hurt. Nearly two years ago the Conference Committee set up a sub-committee to consider and report on the advisability of a Conference Hymn Book. Hence the title crept into common use—use which must now be discarded. Joseph Wood.

The habit of viewing things cheerfully, and of thinking about life hopefully, may be made to grow up in us like any other habit.—Samuel Smiles.

EMERSON THE MAN.

THE roots of Emerson's life we find down in the oldest Puritan generations. His genealogy traces back through successive worthies, ministers and others, to the Bedfordshire vicar, Peter Bulkeley, a man of good substance all ways. In the early days of Charles I., the enterprising vicar crossed the seas, and headed the group of colonists that made their settlement of Concord on the banks of the sleepy stream Musketaquid, a few miles north-west from Boston. On the other side the record leads to the Emersons of the north of old England, perhaps York, perhaps Durham. The Thomas Emerson who in 1635 settled at Ipswich, New England, was a farmer and a baker. It was about this time, too, that John Bunyan's father was a "baker of human bread." The sons in each case also baked human bread of another sort. The thread of ancestry comes at last to the Rev. William Emerson, liberal Independent minister at Boston, where Ralph Waldo, his fourth child and third son, was born May 25, 1803.

It was a home of peace and intelligence that cradled the child. The mother, Ruth, ordered the household in quiet strength. The father—handsome, honest, vigorous, emphatic, scholarly and refined, required their best of his children. Before Waldo was three years old we find his reading was hardly good enough to please his ambitious father. When the boy was eight the father died, and the gentle mother, with strenuous, Calvinistic Aunt Mary Moody Emerson to assist, brought up the family on the slenderest means. The children shared the household work, Waldo aproned with the rest, rhyming as he cleaned the knives. They studied much and fared plainly. Two of the boys shared one great-coat. The heroic Aunt Mary urged all to heroism; if dinner failed, as at least once it did, she stayed their stomachs with stories of endurance. Austerity was their tonic, discipline their healthful air. Her exhortation ran—"Do what you are afraid to do." They grew up fit for something, "a delightful family," says an old letter.

Home education was followed by regular schooling, and that by Harvard College. Waldo's entrance there was facilitated by a £10 grant from some pious founder's bounty, and by modestly acting as "waiter at commons" he secured remission of three-fourths of the fees. When he left college he taught awhile in his brother Edward's school, and elsewhere; then, being from early days designed for the ministry, he entered Cambridge Divinity School, and during three years went through a somewhat broken course of theological study. Happily or not, his sufficiency in the subject was assumed, and at the age of twenty-three he was "approbated to preach." After preaching here and there, he was appointed, in 1829, assistant at the Second Church, Boston. In the same year he married and his happiness seemed complete when before the year closed he was appointed sole minister to the same church.

Clouds gathered but too soon. The delicate wife drooped and died. Mental difficulties multiplied. It was borne in upon him that the stated prayers of the service were not natural to him, and respecting the use of the bread and wine at communion he had strong and persistent scruples. He proposed arrangements to relieve the strain. The congregation patiently deliberated, finally retained their old customs, and Emerson was set free.

He took now (1832-3) a beneficial journey to Europe. On returning he resumed occasional preaching, and so continued for ten years or more. But the work of his life had already been found in giving lectures. He confessed that this, too, was a kind of preaching, but the platform's rule irked less than that of the pulpit. From 1833 onwards he lectured, often in courses. By-and-by he published one volume after another. A modest livelihood was gained. From 1835, when he married again most happily, he lived at the ancestral Concord, in a house of simple comfort and sufficient dignity, with land enough around to secure congenial retirement. Here he brought up his children—all save "that beautiful boy" whose death at the age of five flung him into passionate grief awhile. Here he studied and gardened and grew old. The house was burned down when he was nearly seventy, but was rebuilt for him during a third visit to Europe, and in the new house he spent his ten last years, for the most part free from suffering. He died after a few days illness, April 27, 1882.

Such are the facts, or rather the mere bones of the facts. To see the truth more nearly as it was we seek whatever can give form and body to them. The vision of Emerson's life, like every other, has its shadows; but broadly it is a vision of serene and lovely light. The records afford glimpses of him as boy, youth and man, in each stage a fascination to those around him till old age brings him universal admiration and affection.

He is described as "a spiritual looking boy," a sort of angel in a dull and homely cotton dress. Always affectionate and playful at home, he seems to have impressed outsiders as one who "dwelt in a higher sphere." He was hardly athletic enough or demonstrative enough to be greatly popular with his schoolmates. He was noted by one who was at school with him as "singularly free from faults," but not remarkable in talent.

As he grew up the troubles of the 'teens began, but through them all his essential qualities clung to him. Reserves set in, he became introspective, shy, critical. He heard himself accused of "walking on stilts." His chin was "in the air," his blue eyes looked into distance. He studied without discredit, but without distinction. A roving reader, a woodland walker, greatly ambitious to be eloquent, struggling with the throes of adolescence in body and mind, his pillow not unacquainted with tears—for a time his life seemed undetermined, even sluggish. His brothers, Edward and Charles, far outshone him—at ruinous expense of tissue, each dying in early manhood. He had his own physical troubles, weak eyes, a "mouse in the chest," a rheumatic hip, a feeling of being all clay and no iron, of being in a long battle between life and death "wholly uncertain to whom the game belongs." He hated sickness and the mention of it, yet year after year nature kept him "not sick, but luke-sick," he says.

So it was till he was thirty or so, and the brief chapter of his ministry and first marriage was closed. Then that journey to Europe set him up; the battle, though not ended, inclined definitely to victory. He felt, indeed, early intimations of "growing old," but vigour increased with the years. His eyes gained strength and he needed no glasses till past sixty. His ailments vanished in the fields of Concord, and he lived on to ripe years without further serious illness. In his prime he was as goodly to look upon as when a boy. An early hearer describes him as that "most gracious of mortals, with a face all benignity" who came into their pulpit. Carlyle, at Craigenputtock, never forgot the day "when that supernal vision, Waldo Emerson, dawned upon us."

In person he was tall—said he stood six feet in his boots; slender though not frail; even when struggling with the "mouse in the chest" he scaled nearly eleven stone. Later he was sparer if healthier, and congratulated himself on a half pound more than a hundred and forty. His movements were vigorous but unhasty; "no one saw him run" said Dr. Hedge. Of his voice much is recorded. Margaret Fuller said it had "a grave body tone, full and sweet rather than sonorous, yet flexible and haunted by many modulations." Mr. Whipple, the critic, said "Emerson's voice had a strange power which affected me more than any other voice I ever heard on the stage or on the platform. It was pure thought translated into purely intellectual tone—the perfect music of spiritual utterance."

In private his habits were diligent without fuss. He was simple in diet, smoked a little, indulged himself in "pie" (the American institution) at breakfast, walked in Walden woods or elsewhere of an afternoon, and usually slept well. Many who saw him speak of uniform grace and courtesy, his almost reverential air towards strangers, his quiet gaiety in the home-circle, his beaming smile which refused to break into audible laughter, his kindly consideration for servants and his personal devotion to his guests. In conversation he was extremely choice of words, but, says Arthur Hugh Clough with relief, not so Emersonian as his essays. As years advanced the right words often failed to come, and as he would use no other, gaps ensued. His memory might fail, but never his good-humour.

His sense of the comic kept him sane in the heyday of wildest transcendental experiments. He loved a visionary, but was intensely practical himself. Lowell praises his Yankee head as well-fitted for the exchange. His epitaph, if conformed to the good old pattern, should record that he was a "loving husband," a "good father," and an "upright citizen." He duly attended the town meeting, and sat on the school committee. In public affairs he took interest chiefly as a matter affecting the moral life of the community. He was not eager in the early days of anti-slavery; but later he warmed with the times and became a prophet in the cause, not without his share of hisses and scorn.

As a workman with words no one excelled him. With tools it was different. His little son, seeing him at work in the garden, warned him not to "dig his leg." He admitted that he could split a piece of wood four ways with one nail. After much experience he concluded that practical farming and the vocation of a writer were incompatible; but he kept on digging and planting for exercise and recreation. He delighted in the early morning—"the sweet and serious morning"—the season for fitting employ for man and child, and not even on holidays to be given over to mere amusement. Till midday he studied—reading, noting, quoting, recording thoughts, tabulating, or, as required, collecting sentences long quarried to build into a lecture. Strange tales are told of his methods of organising anew the disjecta membra of bygone addresses—strange and apparently true. But it is not true, says the authoritative biographer, Mr. Cabot, that he rose at nights to jot down sudden inspirations. He had misgivings at times about that lecturing business, east and west. It was too much like making "a puppet show of the Eleusinian mysteries." Needs must; he said his say and took his pay. He felt often the need of a distinct line of work, an imperative daily drudge. Sometimes his "top" would not "spin." He travelled or read books to set up the gyration. He delighted in dramatists and old poets, in writers like Montaigne and Plutarch; the mystics, European and Oriental, he made his own. Great scholar he did not set up to be; his Latin and Greek were there, like his French or German, but he broadly confessed that he would as soon swim a river rather than cross by the bridge as forego the help of a good translation. Some writers of repute were nothing to him, for example, Shelley and Dickens, though he liked the latter when he met him. He feared himself to be but "half a bard," yet all there was of him, he said, "was poet." The artist sense he had abundantly, but music and mathematics were denied him.

He loved little ones, and at once held out his arms for babies. He was at home in the nursery, and the children told him secrets. His special parish, he maintained, was "young men seeking their way." Louisa Alcott, who, as a little girl, wrote letters to him à la Bettine, may speak for the rest: "I can never tell all he has been to me." His inspiring influence was such that Father Taylor, though he estimated it would take as many of his sermons to convert a human soul as quarts of milk to make a man drunk, believed he must be saved, for otherwise he would change the climate of hell, and the devil wouldn't know what to do with him.

So for nearly four score years lived Ralph Waldo Emerson. Hawthorne said there was "a pure intellectual gleam diffusing about his presence like the garment of a shining one." It is this radiant beauty of his life that the wiser world values most. When we read him we do ourselves wrong not to be aware of it. Crabb Robinson said men might listen to him with their reason unconvinced, but always with their reason elevated to a higher power. In his works he scatters abroad his brilliant sayings, his extravagances, mysticisms and amazing paradoxes, with apparent carelessness like that which flings the stars along the midnight sky. Men have to put up with nature's naïveté as best they can; from each other they demand systematised thought. But as a disappointed debater once said, "Emerson never argues." He reports as he sees; and being so "pure in heart" who shall say he sees wrong? W. G. TARRANT.

THIS is the law of benefits between men; the one ought to forget at once what he has given, and the other ought never to forget what he has received.—Seneca.

EMERSON'S DIVINITY SCHOOL ADDRESS.

EMERSON'S address to the Divinity Students at Harvard, in July, 1838, is famous not so much for its new doctrines as for the interest and commotion it created. It was not the beginning of the so-called Transcendental movement. Emerson had previously published his little book on "Nature," and had given many lectures wherein the same teaching was contained. But while hitherto he had been speaking, as it were, in the air, now, in the Harvard Address, he turned directly to Unitarian ministers. He told them that their services were dull and formal, that "the great and perpetual office of the preacher is not performed," that "tradition characterises the preaching of this country; it comes out of the memory, and not out of the soul." He told them that they dwelt "with noxious exaggeration about the person of Jesus," and that "men have come to speak of revelation as somewhat long ago given and done, as if God were dead."

It is the office of a true teacher (he says) to show us that God is, not was; that He speaketh, not spake. The true Christianity—a faith like Christ's in the infinitude of man—is lost. None believeth in the soul of man, but only in some man or person old and departed. Ah me! no man goeth alone. All men go in flocks to this saint or that poet, avoiding the God who seeth in secret. They cannot see in secret; they love to be blind in public.

"I think that no man can go, with his thoughts about him, into one of our churches without feeling that what hold the public worship had on men is gone or going. It has lost its grasp on the affection of the good and the fear of the bad." There is much more of the same quiet but scathing criticism. It was an outspoken, fearless utterance upon the pedantry and ineffectiveness and want of spiritual vitality in public worship and in the Christian ministry. The criticism was especially directed against that body of churches and ministers which were at that time the strongest in New England. The Unitarians were the most cultivated and most powerful body of men in Boston; they claimed to be the most liberal and open-minded and most full of life. To them belonged men like Dr. Channing, Henry Ware, junr., and Dr. Gannett, whose names and work must always be held in honour amongst us. It must have been painful and irritating to have been told by a young man of thirty-five, himself until recently a Unitarian minister, that there was "no open vision," and that worship and preaching were dying of traditionalism. Emerson tries to guard himself against the charge of a sweeping condemnation.

Let me not taint the sincerity of this plea by any oversight of the claims of good men. I know and honour the purity and strict conscience of numbers of the clergy. What life the public worship retains, it owes to the scattered company of pious men who minister here and there in the churches, and who, sometimes accepting with too great tenderness the tenets of the elders, have not accepted from others, but from their own heart, the genuine impulses of virtue, and so still command our love and awe to the sanctity of character.

But even with this qualification, we can understand that Unitarian orthodoxy would be provoked and would approach the positive doctrines interspersed among the attacks with something of hostility. We need not dwell further on the storm that arose. Many good men were irritated for the time with Emerson, as they always are when young idealists speak out. It is the danger of such idealists to ignore what has been done and to exaggerate the evils of the present situation. Even Emerson with his gentle, sympathetic nature did not wholly avoid that danger.

The important question is, however, what was the positive thought contained in the Address and in the so-called Transcendental movement which found expression in that Address.

Transcendentalism was a vivid joy and faith in humanity. Emerson believed in man's faculties, in man's nature and in the God who made man and was revealed through all things He had made. "Everything was felt to be beginning," says Mr. Cabot in his "Life of Emerson." The bonds of tradition were loosed, new prospects were opening on every side. An intoxication was in the air from which the most conservative were not exempt." "Never before and never since has the brain of Massachusetts felt such stimulus as it received during the next few years," says Mr. W. C. Gannett in the life of his father. We are inclined to doubt that statement and to believe that it was the feelings not the mind which were most stirred to activity. The weakness of Transcendentalism as a permanent force is explained by the statement of Mr. Cabot that it "was not a philosophy but a religious revival, a wave of sentiment." The religious revival, the deeper faith would naturally and rightly come first but it should have been followed by a strongly reasoned philosophy. That philosophy is certainly not to be found in Emerson; he was the poet, not the thinker of the movement. Æschylus and Sophocles are followed or accompanied by Plato; Shakespeare is accompanied by Bacon, Wordsworth by Coleridge, Browning and Tennyson by Ruskin, Martineau, T. H. Green and others. Mr. Green sets himself definitely to deal through reason with the guesses at the

> Sweet strange mystery
> Of what beyond these things may lie,
> And yet remain unseen, of which the highest poetry of our time has spoken. Emerson's work was essentially that of the seer; he could not organise his thought; he had nothing to reply to argument. It was this probably which irritated such men as Dr. Martineau. They could not be content to take him as a seer, a "friend of those who would live in the spirit." He wrote largely in prose, he had the air of a philosopher—his friends and disciples thought him one; but when he was tried by the tests of philosophy he wholly failed to satisfy them. Emerson and the Transcendental movement needed a philosophical Aaron and a militant Joshua to carry on the work. As a movement, we venture to say it failed for want of thought. But this criticism does not affect in any way the value of Emerson's intuitions when they are taken for what they are—scattered glimpses of truth, visions of reality recorded by a living soul. The feeling and faith of Emerson as expressed in the Divinity School Address and other writings of the period remind us continually of the faith and feeling of Wordsworth at the time of the French Revolution.

Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive,
But to be young was very heaven! Oh times
In which the meagre, stale, forbidding ways
Of custom, law and statute took at once
The attractions of a country in romance!

Nothing could be more false than to regard the Divinity School Address as an attack on religion or on worship or on preaching. It came from one who believed profoundly in these things, and just because of his belief in man and God was offended by "the meagre, stale, forbidding ways," and by the doctrines and customs

Heavy as frost and deep almost as life under which true religion and worship were buried.

I believe the Christian religion to be profoundly true (he says in a letter), true to an extent that they who are styled its most orthodox defenders have never, or but in the rarest glimpses once or twice in a lifetime, reached. I am for the principles; they are for the men. They reckon me unbelieving; I, with better reason, them.

In the Harvard Address he speaks of the worth of true worship with a conviction and a beauty that could hardly be surpassed. "What greater calamity can fall upon a nation than the loss of worship? Then all things go to decay. Genius leaves the temple, to haunt the senate or the market. Literature becomes frivolous. Science is cold. The eye of youth is not lighted by the hope of other worlds, and age is without honour. Society lives to trifles, and when men die we do not mention them."

And then in speaking to the young men preparing for the ministry, it is not against preaching, but against lifeless formal doctrinal preaching that he warns them.

Two inestimable advantages Christianity has given us: first, the Sabbath, the jubilee of the whole world, everywhere suggesting even to the vile the dignity of spiritual being. And secondly, the institution of preaching—the speech of man to men—essentially the most flexible of all organs. What hinders that now everywhere, in pulpits, in lecture-rooms, in houses, in fields, wherever the invitations of men or your own occasions lead you, you speak the very truth, as your life and conscience teach it, and cheer the waiting, fainting hearts of men with new hope, new revelation?

And elsewhere in the same address he says: "Preaching is the expression of the moral sentiment in application to the duties of life. . . . When shall I hear these august laws of moral being so pronounced as to fill my ear and I feel ennobled by the offer of my uttermost action and passion?" "By trusting your own heart, you shall gain more confidence in other men. For all our puny wisdom, for all our soul-destroying slavery to habit, it is not to be doubted that all men have sublime thoughts, that all men value the few real hours of life; they love to be caught up into the vision of principles." Here, as in so many other places, Emerson is insisting on his favourite doctrine of independence, of self-reverence. Be yourself, act out your own thought,

Look in your heart and write.

That teaching seems to slight tradition, history, the thoughts of the dead, and the experiences of ages as expressed through law and custom.

But it must be remembered that the same criticism is true of Wordsworth's teaching:—

One impulse from the vernal wood
May teach you more of man,
Of moral evil and of good,
Than all the sages can.

After all, men can only understand the past if they are alive in the present; they can only reverence the thoughts of others by reverencing the spirit which speaks to all, and which is best known in their own hearts.

The power and inspiration of Emerson which has made him so deep an influence in many lives is, at whatever distance, allied to that of him about whom it was said, "He spoke with authority, and not as the Scribes." Emerson spoke with that first-hand authority of the man who sees and feels things for himself, the man who realises the divine in his own common life. He bids these young men see things for themselves, and reverence the divine spirit which is in them. That advice may lead to extravagance and mistake—it needs to be supplemented by dwelling on the true value of books and the experience of others, as Emerson had already done in his address on "The American Scholar." But, above all other needs, now and always is the need for self-reverence—the need for believing in the world and in our own soul, the need for trusting to the ever-present God. If you are fully alive and strong and fearless you may know truth for yourselves; the spirit is above all forms and creeds and customs. Through it, and not through books and doctrines, can you enter into life. The Harvard Address was an appeal to the man in men; it was an appeal to the over-soul which is in all. To this appeal many responded with joy, and a new hope and courage. It is the appeal of the prophet: "Son of man, stand upon thy feet, and I will speak with thee." That appeal, when spoken from the heart, as Emerson spoke it, makes for individuality, for freedom, and for spiritual life.

HENRY GOW.

HOURS WITH EMERSON.

SOME men confess that to them Emerson is a sealed book. It is not sufficient to say that they do not understand him; he is nothing to them, for them he has no message; his music awakes no responsive chord in their breast. To others he is different; to them he is far more than a "voice oracular"; he is, or was, a revealer, one of those gifted with the power of opening men's eyes to the ideal, the spiritual, the infinite, enabling them to realise the intimate relation between the individual and the universal. On these he conferred light, strength, and peace, and above all a kind of primeval freedom of the soul. The influence of his teaching on those who first heard it and caught his spirit is perhaps best expressed in Mr O. B. Frothingham's words:—

Transcendentalism as viewed by its disciples, was a pilgrimage from the idolatrous world of creeds and ritual to the temple of the living God in the soul. It was a putting to silence tradition and formula that the sacred oracle might be heard. The past might be well enough for those who, without make-belief, could put faith in common dogmas and common usages, but for them the matin bells of a new day were chiming and the herald trump of freedom was heard upon the mountains.

I am happy to count myself amongst the early disciples of Emerson, not amongst the earliest, for they, probably, have all passed away. But still early enough to have felt something of that first wave of enthusiasm which made Emerson the leader of a large but widely scattered host.

I cannot fix the year when I first became acquainted with the early writings of Ralph Waldo Emerson, and it is equally impossible for me to say, to use a trite phrase, how much I am indebted to him. With little, if any, exaggeration I think I might say, I owe him everything. His is the key which opens all doors. It is not merely that he led his disciples to reject certain opinions, and embrace certain other opinions, but he set them on a new road by awakening a new consciousness, by determining the direction of their inner life. He inspired them with trust; trust in the universal and trust in themselves; setting them free from any reliance upon or servitude to the local and the temporal; he enlarged their vision, kindled their aspirations, almost gave them their souls.

I found in him a spirit congenial to my own; a voice to whose call my heart immediately responded. For, fortunately, I met with Emerson's writings in my youthful days, when I was ready to receive his impress; with a mind at once open and free from doubt, imprisoned in no system and unafraid of heresy; and, happily, I had no one to warn me that his writings were "dangerous."

How long ago this was I can scarcely tell. I remember purchasing the first two volumes of his "Orations and Essays" I came across at a bookstall in the Kennington-road. They were in "Slater's Shilling Series" published in 1849. But it was later, in 1870, as a pencilled note in the book reminds me, that I bought a copy (or copies, for I have two of them by me still) of "May Day and Other Pieces" (Routledge, 1867) at the railway bookstall at Hampton Court. One advantage of these small volumes was that they could be carried in the pocket, and by this I profited. It has always been my habit to read in the open air, and so I first read Emerson in his proper environment—in the fields and by the river-side. He is always associated in my mind with the scenes in the midst of which I first became acquainted with him, especially the scenery of the River Thames between Moulsey and Weybridge, which was one of my favourite walks. Moulsey Hurst was then an open space, and the banks of the river between Moulsey and Sunbury were undisfigured by the Lambeth waterworks; there was no hotel at Sunbury weir on the Surrey side, but only a small old inn; Walton bridge was partly broken down, and the iron structure which now offends the eye had not been built; the whole stretch of the river above Hampton Court bridge retained its rural aspect. Even Tagg's Island was in its primitive rusticity. On the river itself there was scarcely any traffic, and ordinarily the banks were a beautiful solitude, which on many an idle day I enjoyed alone with a book. It is always with this scene especially that my thoughts of Emerson are blended, though not this scene alone. I have never seen the Concord River, nor rambled in Walden, nor gazed upon the pond which Thoreau has made so familiar to my imagination; but the Thames and the hills and woods of Surrey served my purpose. Emerson has somewhere said that Christianity can be best understood in the open air, and I am sure that Emerson himself can be best appreciated under the same condition, and perhaps for the same reason: Jesus preached in the open air, and the open air was Emerson's study, and so in the open air we place ourselves en rapport with such teachers.

Here, then, as I breathed the summer air and drank in the never-tiring beauty of the familiar scene, I drew in at the same time the elevating thought and exhilarating spirit of Emerson.

One of these volumes, which I still cherish (the other, alas! I lent and never recovered), contains orations and lectures; the lost one contained the first series of essays. It has always been, to my mind, a subject for gratitude that this was the first I knew of Emerson, for the first oration in the volume is the one on "Man Thinking" ("The American Scholar"), delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society on Aug. 31, 1837, and the second is the "Address Delivered Before the Senior Class in Divinity College, Cambridge, Sunday evening, July 15, 1838." I still think everyone who wishes to know the original Emerson—Emerson at his highest—should begin with these. Next to these in my estimation at the time—an estimate that is not changed—came the Essays, especially those on Self-Reliance, Spiritual Laws, and the Over-Soul. Of the poems my favourites were "Waldeinsamkeit," the "Song of Nature," and the "Boston Hymn."

All that he wrote afterwards, it seems to me, is but the application and illustration of the ideas contained in these few essays, orations, and verses. To me he would still be the Emerson I love had he written no more, for a great writer is not necessarily he who has written much, but he who has uttered a few great thoughts, or, may I not say, the few great thoughts which are the spiritual food of man. To have begun thus early with the quintessence of Emerson was an advantage scarcely to be realised by those who now have to become acquainted with him through his collected writings, whether in one volume or several. In a certain one-volume edition I sometimes use the early essays are indeed put first, but the orations are placed at the end of the book, and may never be reached by the reader who opens the volume with the intention of reading it through; but those who began long ago, where Emerson himself began, and have followed up the reading year by year, know exactly where to find what they want—the Emerson who rapt our spirits when we were young, and who has illumined our pathway ever since.

I said Emerson was one of those who have uttered, or re-uttered, the few great thoughts by which men live. It is what he said himself:—

> The first thing we have to say respecting what are called new views here in New England, at the present time, is, that they are not new, but the very oldest thoughts cast into the mould of these new times.

Yet these old thoughts come as new to the generation which is privileged to hear them repeated in its own language; for long periods they are neglected, or buried under conventional rubbish; authority usurps the place of freedom, and words are mistaken for the spirit; but once and again some soul is born unfettered, or frees itself, and rediscovers immortal truths which have been lost to sight. To such a soul authority and convention no longer exist, or they are recognised as enemies of the soul and are deliberately thrust on one side. It is thus truth is found, and with truth freedom and power. The soul recovers its natural force and goes joyfully on its way proclaiming the truth which makes men free. This is the secret of Emerson; he had, as I said, found the key which opens all doors; the key is the soul itself,—"The one thing in the world of value is the active soul,—the soul, free, sovereign, active." Tried by this standard every thing is seen in its true proportion.

These essays and orations were no mere words to those who first heard them, but life, spirit, and liberty; and the new insight which they conferred upon his disciples endowed them, like their master, with courage and confidence. There is little of what is commonly called controvery in Emerson; he did not trouble to dispute, he affirmed, and error withered away before the flame of his thought. Those who learned the lesson Emerson had to teach did not concern themselves about orthodoxy or heterodoxy; old doctrines were simply cast aside like a worn-out garment for which they had no further use; they might hereafter be examined as matters of curious or antiquarian interest, but they were parted with, without a struggle or regret, as things which had lost their value. It is all written here in these few pages, written before Emerson was forty years of age.

One might quote passage after passage to exhibit the spirit of Emerson's teaching if it were necessary or I had space. For him there existed of primary value only Nature, the Soul and God—the Over-Soul All else was secondary; institutions and books were to be tolerated only so far as they helped the soul; if they hindered the soul, they must be abandoned to their fate. His constant themes were Nature and Man, or rather for him they constituted only one theme—the world, as seen by the thinker and poet. Too often the Naturalist neglects Man, and the Psychologist overlooks Nature, and thus both only see half the world and are unable to read a single page correctly; but Emerson found an inseparable relation between "the starry heavens over us and the moral law within us."

It is all there in these early pages, and, in a sense, it is all there is, Nature and the Soul. Science, literature, history, are but imperfect records of these, while the originals are within our reach, and we may, if we will, read and experience them at first hand for ourselves. The schools and the churches only offer them to us at second hand, often misunderstood or corrupted; it is difficult and often pronounced dangerous to trust your own soul, but Emerson banished our fears and the difficulties and dangers vanished. He only uttered the talismanic word, "Trust thyself," and the field was won.

Since those early days when I read Emerson by the riverside or in the woods, the hours I have spent with him are beyond count; not always with his books; but the spirit of them, shall I not say his spirit, has accompanied me in my solitary walks; it has been with me in the study, the lecture-room and the church. I cannot escape him; he cast a spell upon me which I have no wished to shake off.

WALTER LLOYD.

EDITIONS OF "EMERSON."

"THE Sovereign Emerson," printed on India paper, in four crown 8vo volumes, we have not yet seen, but it is advertised by Messrs. Routledge in our present issue, and it is highly spoken of. The same firm are the English publishers of the copyright standard "Riverside Edition," issued by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin and Co., in Boston, and edited by Emerson's literary executor, Mr. J. E. Cabot. This edition is in twelve volumes, the first nine containing all that was included during the author's lifetime in his collected works, the other three adding various lectures, &c., from his MSS. The "Miscellanies" of Volume XI. include Emerson's sermon on the Lord's Supper, preached when he was retiring from the pulpit of the Second Church, and a notable address to the Free Religious Association. The last volume, published in 1893, has a full General Index to the collected Works. Routledge's cheap one-volume edition of Emerson (without the contents of the later Riverside volumes) is printed in double column, and the small type is wonderfully clear.

But for pleasant reading we commend the six volumes of Macmillan's Eversley edition, of which the first volume contains Mr. John Morley's masterly Introduction. This edition has not command of the copyright matter of the later Riverside volumes, but up to that point it is complete. If anyone has to choose one only of these volumes, we should be inclined to follow Mr. Garnett's lead and say take "The Conduct of Life." In this edition "Society and Solitude" is in the same volume. Messrs. Macmillan were also the publishers of Cabot's "Life of Emerson," but unfortunately this, the best of the Lives, is now out of print.

The edition of Emerson in Bohn's Standard Library has been in the past one of the most useful and popular, and is now issued in three 3s. 6d. volumes. The stereo-plates seem to be a good deal worn, but it is still a good readable edition. To the third volume a number of miscellaneous pieces are added, including the essays on Thoreau and Plutarch, and what will be to some readers of special interest, Emerson's Introduction to "Parnassus," his selections from English and American poets, published in 1875, with the contents of the poems. Messrs. Bell and Sons also issue the chief sections of Emerson's Works in seven handy shilling volumes.

A good selection from Emerson's Essays and Addresses, in type somewhat larger than Routledge's one-volume edition, is published in the "Scott Library" (1s. 6d.), with a thoughtful Introduction by Mr. Percival Chubb.

A special edition of the "Divinity School Address," in commemoration of the Emerson Centenary, with introduction, portrait, is announced by Mr. Philip Green.

At the end of Dr. Garnett's "Life of Emerson," in the "Great Writers" series (an admirable little book), will be found a full Bibliography. The biographical works by G. W. Cooke, Alexander Ireland, M. D. Conway and O. W. Holmes, together with "Emerson in Concord," by his son, Dr. Edward Waldo Emerson, are all thoroughly worth study in connection with the two volumes of Cabot.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

PEOPLE who love the memory of Ralph Waldo Emerson are thinking of him specially about this time; for on May 25th it will be just 100 years since he was born, and so we are celebrating his centenary.

Why do so many people love Emerson's memory? Because he has left behind him a great influence, and has taught men by his example, his words, and his writings that above all things in life they must be faithful to what they know is right. "He serves all who dares be true" was one of his well-known sayings; another was "Be and not seem." Not only grown-up men and women, but children also, who know anything about Emerson's teachings will learn from him to be true and honest, and to follow the guiding voice of conscience which never fails to warn those who listen to it.

Perhaps you may remember reading a few months ago some stories about Emerson's boyhood, which I told you in the Children's Column, showing how, even when he was quite a small boy, he began to be his widowed mother's brave little helper, and to set himself to do what he knew was right as each day came. Waldo never forgot some words spoken to him in boyhood. He treasured them as sacred precepts which he must obey. These words were "Scorn trifles, lift your aims, do what you are afraid to do." And so the little lad learned very early to care nothing for the little hardships, the pinches of poverty and the disappointments in his life; to keep clearly in view the noble character he wanted to build up and the good, helpful life he longed to lead; and to resolve, however hard it was, always to act truly and speak truly, though to do so might lead him into danger and trouble.

It is a fact worth remembering about this American lad who was to be such a famous man in later years that for want of money his mother sent him to the Free Public School in Boston where all the roughest street boys went, saying to him, "Prove yourself of gentle birth by your behaviour," and this he never failed to do. Then, too, we may picture him driving his mother's cow to pasture on his way to school, and helping her in the house work-when his lessons were done, for she made a living by taking in boarders. This was the kind of boyhood he led, faithful to little duties, and thus he was prepared to obey the call to harder tasks in later life.

Do you remember the story of Theodore Parker who, when a little fellow, was just about to lift his stick thoughtlessly to strike a tortoise that lay asleep by the side of a sunny pond? Suddenly a whisper seemed to say "Don't!" Down dropped the stick, and he ran to his mother to ask the meaning of the warning, and heard from her of the voice of God within which was whispering in his soul.

Like Theodore Parker, Emerson early discovered about this inward voice which speaks to young as well as old, and in one of his poems he wrote these famous words—

So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
  So near is God to man,
When duty whispers low, "Thou must,"
  The youth replies "I can."

I think just here you may like to read a story which Emerson often loved to tell. One day, in his presence, a little girl, eager to enjoy some forbidden pleasure, ran to her mother to ask leave. "What does the little voice within thee say?" asked the Quaker mother, and the child ran away to think. Coming back again she said, "Mother, the little voice says no," and that ended the matter, for the child knew that she must obey her conscience.

You will easily believe that Emerson's friends and favourite companions were chosen from among men and women who always dared to be true to that voice of conscience. "Why do you honour her so much?" someone asked Emerson, speaking of a simple-minded old lady, one of his special friends, who had apparently nothing very attractive about her. Emerson had found out that she feared nothing but doing wrong, and he answered, "If she had said 'Yea' and the whole world thundered in her ears 'Nay' she would still have said 'Yea'; that is why I honour her."

That was one thing that Emerson taught men, to trust the voice of God within them and obey it. "Beware from right to swerve" is a line from his "Boston Hymn." Another lesson he taught was to keep noble ideals in view, to treasure great thoughts, and plan noble aims and carry them out in life. "Hitch your wagon to a star," he wrote, and by this he meant that in every-day life we must keep in view what is good and beautiful and try to turn our thoughts into deeds.

Without halting, without rest,
  Lifting Better up to Best,
Planting seeds of knowledge pure,
  Through earth to ripen, through heaven endure.

Do you know about the home where he lived in later years with his wife and children in Concord? It is said the gate was never closed; every visitor was heartily welcomed. He was a lover of all that was good. "Truth alone makes rich and great;" he used to say: "We have simply to try to live the life that Jesus lived." The poor working people about Concord had no friend more wise and kind than he. Wherever he went he shed a good influence about him. Little children gathered round him to listen to his simple teachings as well as wise men and women who came from far to learn lessons of wisdom from him. He had words of help and encouragement for the little lad that carried the firewood and the poor old washerwoman who did not know how to read. Emerson had many sorrows in his life, and made many enemies because he spoke out boldly against slavery and other wrongs; but there was a constant spirit of hopefulness and joy about him. It was his life's work to make the world happier and better.

On bravely through the sunshine and the showers
Time has his work to do and we have ours.

This was a verse he wrote. It tells us what a brave heart he had and what an earnest, faithful life he led.

And now there is only room for a word or two about the end of his life. As he grew old great numbers of people honoured and loved him. The essays and poems he had written and the lectures he had delivered had made him famous, and you will like to know that young as well as old reverenced him for the true, good life he led. When he lay dying a host of school children and their teachers in a far distant State were planting a group of trees in his honour. It was not long before the sad news reached them that he had passed away, and as the tidings were carried quickly from land to land, men who had never seen his face mourned his loss. The streets of Concord were draped with black, and a great silent crowd carried the lifeless body and laid it in the beautiful cemetery. No name was carved on the rock that marked his resting-place. Men knew that the real Emerson, who had lived and taught among them, did not lie there. Should we not treasure the memory of this great man and carry his words in our hearts to rule our lives?

"Be and not seem." "He serves all who dares be true." "Hitch your wagon to a star," and best of all the verse,—

So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
  So near is God to man,
When duty whispers low, "Thou must,"
  The youth replies "I can."

THE Moral Instruction League have arranged to hold a public meeting on Wednesday evening next, in the smaller Queen's Hall, Langham-place, to urge the Government to introduce systematic Non-theological Moral Instruction in place of the present religious instruction into all State-supported schools. It will be seen from the advertisement in another column that among the speakers announced are Mr. Allanson Picton and the Rev. James Harwood.

THIS is the last number of THE INQUIRER that will be printed by Messrs. Woodfall and Kinder, in Long Acre, the firm having amalgamated with Messrs. Unwin Brothers, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate hill, where next week's issue will be printed. Thus while Messrs. John and Edward Kinder will still be actively engaged in the business, a name which has almost from the first been associated with the production of THE INQUIRER, will no longer appear on our imprint. It was in December, 1842, that Mr. Richard Kinder, father of the present heads of the firm, began to print THE INQUIRER when it was not yet a year old, and for some years he was not only printer but proprietor of the paper. In 1852 he joined forces with Mr. Woodfall and established the firm which now, after fifty-one years, enters upon a new connection. The name of Woodfall was associated in the eighteenth century with the printing of the famous Junius Letters. Richard Kinder, and afterwards Messrs. Woodfall and Kinder, were the printers of nearly all of Dr. Martineau's books, except those published by the Clarendon Press. In the employ of the firm there are men who have been for many years closely connected with the production of THE INQUIRER. For those of them to whom this change means a loss of present employment we have the warmest sympathy, and to all alike we would take this opportunity of expressing our gratitude for long and faithful services.

LONDON, MAY 23, 1903.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

THE Centenary of EMERSON'S birth, May 25, 1803, in Boston, the chief city of New England, brings to us a most welcome occasion for thankful memories, and renewed communion with one of whom MATTHEW ARNOLD truly spoke as "the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit." There are other associations of that time which it is pleasant to recall. When the child was just a week old, WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING entered upon his ministry in Boston. Two years later, JAMES MARTINEAU was born, and five years after that, THEODORE PARKER. They are the four prophets of the Liberal Faith, whose names we delight to link together in grateful commemoration. Each one was a reformer in his own way and a prophet of the inward, spiritual life. We do not ask here which was the greatest, whose influence will be the most permanent, who had the profoundest insight. They were brethren of one fellowship, and as we now recall the memory of EMERSON, that "beautiful and rare spirit," it is fitting to link his name with those of the other three.

EMERSON was the only one of the four who withdrew from the stated ministry of religion, to which his life, as theirs, had been early dedicated; yet he remained, no less than they, to the end a teacher of religion, an inspirer of the better life. "Ceasing to write sermons," says Mr. GANNETT, "he began unconsciously to write scriptures." Though he retired from the pulpit, he never ceased to be a preacher—what he sought was simply freedom to speak his word with absolute sincerity. In that intimate memoir, "Emerson in Concord," written by his son, we find this testimony :—

> Religion was not with him something apart, a separate attitude of the mind, or function, but so instant and urgent that it led him out of the Church, which then seemed to him its tomb, into the living day, and he said, "Nature is too thin a screen: the glory of the One breaks in everywhere."

Similarly Mr. J. B. THAYER, in a letter appended to "A Western Journey with Mr. Emerson," asks :—

> What was it Emerson set himself to do? He left the pulpit, not because he no longer wished to preach, but because he was not willing to preach under the limitations of that place. He continued all his life to be a preacher, a proclaimer of spiritual truth, a preacher of the moral law. He was flooded and full to overflowing all through his life with a sense of the presence, the omnipresence, and the instant operation of what he called "the Over-Soul." His apprehension and acceptance of this was no merely intellectual matter; it was something that penetrated into the substance of his being, and moved him like a vital force; it was this, with its related beliefs, that gave such power to his speech and such charm to his character, as of one who had already entered upon the immortal life.

Those are words of a devoted disciple. Another friend of many years, the late OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, in a tribute to EMERSON spoken soon after his death, referred to the excitement caused by his early radical teaching, in these characteristic words :—

> What could we do with this unexpected, unprovided for, unclassified, half-unwelcome newcomer, who had been for a while potted, as it were, in our Unitarian cold greenhouse, but had taken to growing so fast that he was lifting off its glass roof and letting in the hailstorms? Here was a protest that outflanked the extreme left of liberalism, yet so calm and serene that its radicalism had the accents of the gospel of peace. Here was an iconoclast without a hammer, who took down our idols from their pedestals so tenderly that it seemed like an act of worship.

EMERSON'S teaching was penetrating and rousing in a high degree to those who were ready for his word; it was illuminating in the truest sense, a testimony to the inward light, uttered with the calm conviction of a veritable seer; and yet more potent than his word was the influence of his personality. Thus Dr. HOLMES concludes his "Life of Emerson" :—

> Judged by his life Emerson comes very near our best ideal of humanity. . . . His writings, whether in prose or verse, are worthy of admiration, but his manhood was the underlying quality which gave them their true value. It was in virtue of this that his rare genius acted on so many minds as a trumpet call to awaken them to the meaning and the privileges of this earthly existence with all its infinite promise. . . . He shaped an ideal for the commonest life, he proposed an object to the humblest seeker after truth. Look for beauty in the world around you, he said, and you shall see it everywhere. Look within, with pure eyes and simple trust, and you shall find the Deity mirrored in your own soul. Trust yourself because you trust the voice of God in your inmost consciousness.

So also MATTHEW ARNOLD, who ranks EMERSON'S "Essays" as the most important work done in prose, in our language, during the nineteenth century, setting them side by side with WORDSWORTH'S poetry as the most important work done in verse :—

> Yes, truly, his insight is admirable; his truth precious. Yet the secret of his effect is not even in these; it is in his temper. It is in the hopeful, serene, beautiful temper wherewith these, in Emerson, are indissolubly joined; in which they work and have their being.

There are many witnesses to this commanding influence of EMERSON'S personality. "We do not go to hear what EMERSON says," LOWELL averred, speaking of him as a lecturer, "so much as to hear EMERSON." "It was impossible," said HAWTHORNE, "to dwell in his vicinity without inhaling more or less the mountain atmosphere of his lofty thought." And CARLYLE, speaking to Mr. MONCURE CONWAY after his Rectorial address at Edinburgh of his early meeting with EMERSON, said :—

> I did not then adequately recognise Emerson's genius; but she and I thought him a beautiful transparent soul, and he was always a very pleasant object to us in the distance. Now and then a letter still comes from him, and amid the smoke and mist of the world it is always as a window flung open to the azure.

In modern literature there are few books of more fascinating interest than the two volumes of the "Correspondence of Carlyle and Emerson," edited by Mr. C. E. NORTON; indeed, MATTHEW ARNOLD expressed the opinion that CARLYLE might live longer in these volumes, "an invaluable record," even as JOHNSON lives in BOSWELL, than in his own works. And certainly the record of this friendship is delightful, the sombre passion of CARLYLE throwing into all the greater relief the radiance of EMERSON'S nature. One thoroughly characteristic passage we must have the pleasure of quoting here.

Writing to EMERSON of an English edition of some of his addresses, &c., in November, 1844, CARLYLE says of the book :—"It is a sermon to me, as all your other deliberate utterances are; a real word, which I feel to be such—alas, almost or altogether the one such, in a world all full of jargons, hearsays, echoes, and vain noises, which cannot pass with me for words!" And then he adds :—

> For the rest, I have to object still (what you will call objecting against the Law of Nature) that we find you a speaker indeed, but as it were a soliloquiser on the eternal mountain-tops only, in vast solitudes where men and their affairs be all hushed in a very dim remoteness; and only the man and the stars and the earth are visible, whom, so fine a fellow seems he, we could perpetually punch into, and say, "Why won't you come and help us then? We have terrible need of one man like you down among us! It is cold and vacant up there; nothing paintable but rainbows and emotions; come down, and you shall do life-pictures, passions, facts, which transcend all thought, and leave it stuttering and stammering!" To which he answers that he won't, can't, and doesn't want to (as the Cockneys have it); and so I leave him, and say, "You Western Gymnosophist! Well, we can afford one man for that too.

To which EMERSON replied at the end of the following month, thanking CARLYLE for his introduction to the book, with its friendly wit, but saying that he must not do it again, since a preface from him is "a sort of banner or oriflamme, a little too splendid for my occasion, and misleads."

I fancy my readers to be a very quiet, plain, even obscure class—men and women of some religious culture and aspirations, young, or else mystical, and by no means including the great literary and fashionable army, which no man can count, who now read your books. If you introduce me, your readers and the literary papers try to read me, and with false expectations. I had rather have fewer readers and only such as belong to me.

Of CARLYLE'S criticism of his book, he says, "Your words are very gentle. I should describe it much more harshly," and adds that his own consciousness of defects is all but sufficient to hinder him from writing at all.

But of what you say now and heretofore respecting the remoteness of my writing and thinking from real life, though I hear substantially the same criticism made by my countrymen, I do not know what it means. If I can at any time express the law and the ideal right, that should satisfy me without measuring the divergence from it of the last act of Congress. And though I sometimes accept a popular call, and preach on Temperance or the Abolition of Slavery, as lately on Aug. 1, I am sure to feel, before I have done with it, what an intrusion it is into another sphere, and so much loss of virtue in my own.

This is a man whom it is good to be with. When people criticise and disagree, he listens quietly and respectfully, but then adds: "I shall go on just as before, seeing whatever I can, and telling what I see." He has told us much, and life is richer and more beautiful because he has lived.

THE mountain and the squirrel
Had a quarrel;
And the former called the latter "Little Prig."
Bun replied,
"You are doubtless very big;
But all sorts of things and weather
Must be taken in together,
To make up a year
And a sphere.
And I think it no disgrace
To occupy my place.
If I'm not so large as you,
You are not so small as I,
And not half so spry.
I'll not deny you make
A very pretty squirrel track;
Talents differ; all is well and wisely put;
If I cannot carry forests on my back,
Neither can you crack a nut."

R. W. EMERSON.

EMERSON'S INSPIRATION FOR RELIGION.

"You say there is no religion now. 'Tis like saying in rainy weather, there is no sun, when at that moment we are witnessing one of his superlative effects." Emerson had resigned his ministry in the Church because its forms, or some of them, seemed to him no longer vehicles of the spirit or shrines of its indwelling life. And when it was charged against him, and others like him, that they were forsaking religion, he claimed that it was the inspiration of religion which laid this duty upon them of nonconformity and revolt. This inability to appear religious, after the conventional manner, was itself an effect—a "superlative effect"—of the true religious temper. The forsaking of forms was but a sign of the spirit's energy creating for itself fresh forms, more expansive and more responsive, to its advancing life.

It is true that Emerson seems to fall back on ethics and to make his final appeal to the moral sentiment. This is the great note of that Divinity Address which shocked and offended so many pious souls. "Whilst a man seeks good ends he is strong by the whole strength of nature." "The perception of this law of laws awakens in the mind a sentiment which we call the religious sentiment and which makes our highest happiness." And much later, in his great essay on "Worship," he says: "Men talk of 'mere morality,' which is as much as if one should say, 'Poor God, with nobody to help him.'" Yet in many an impassioned utterance we find him rising into those realms of insight and emotion where ethics alone will not serve; or if the word be retained, it has become charged with all the life and fervour which, to seer and saint and saviour, the word "religion" holds.

It may be well, however, to distinguish between the religious and ethical influence which a great man wields over his fellows. It is for ever true that, in the large synthesis of life, religion and morality are one; yet, in serious human discourse, the words have their difference of meaning, of which it is wise not to lose sight. In religion we are concerned with life as a whole—with our relation to the Eternal Power by which all things exist. In morality we are concerned with life as social and humane—with our relation to other beings who share life with us here. No sharp, fixed line, indeed, can be drawn to separate these relations; and religion, apprehended in its large significance, must ever include morality, seeing that life as a whole, and in its eternal relations, must realise all its interests and powers. Yet it is man's attitude of thought and feeling towards God, the Immanent Spirit of all life, that we rightly term religious; and his attitude and behaviour towards his fellows, that we rightly term moral or ethical. And while the more vital and essential elements of religion are those of Trust, Reverence, and Obedience; of morality they are Justice, Sympathy, Mercy, Compassion, Love.

As a prophet and quickener of the spiritual life, the greater strength of Emerson is probably on the side of ethics. His message has, perhaps, its surest elevation and distinction, as a moral challenge to his age. His great appeal is for nobler manners, finer social instincts, deeper ethical faith. Yet his religious influence is hardly less strong and far-reaching and impressive. And of those three elements of religion mentioned above, it is in relation to two of them that he so greatly moves us, and is, as Arnold said of him, "the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit." Few great spiritual teachers of our day, have either by word or example, more effectively persuaded us of the wisdom of trustfulness and obedience than Emerson. To nobly trust and cheerfully obey is ever the call of his serene and serious voice; and his life, through its long and brave career, is a testimony to the strength and joy which such trust and obedience may give to the soul. In omitting reverence, I am not wishing to suggest that Emerson was an irreverent person. I mean only that it was not in the direction of this aspect of the religious consciousness that his influence was most powerful. No serious reader of him would assert that he was wanting in devoutness and lowliness of mind; yet neither can we claim that the devoutness of a Channing or a Martineau was his. Doubtless some of his fearless and exultant words have seemed to many a devout spirit almost profane. He tells us that when he was quite young a "valued adviser" was urging upon him "the dear old doctrines of the Church."

On my saying, "What have I to do with the sacredness of traditions, if I live wholly from within?" my friend suggested, "But these impulses may be from below, not from above." I replied, "They do not seem to me such; but if I am the Devil's child, I will then live wholly from the Devil."

That sounds profane to many serious minds; and perhaps they will not read on to the next sentence, "No law can be sacred to me but that of my nature," which at once recalls the higher truth. So when he writes, "Nothing can bring you peace but yourself," the devout spirit may be offended; but again the following sentence corrects the audacity and reveals the true intent: "Nothing can bring you peace but the triumph of principles."

I cannot admit that Emerson was wanting in reverence; but I will admit that we do not go to him when we wish to feel as some of the Hebrew psalms or the author of the "Imitation," or even Marcus Aurelius may help us to feel. His power of religious inspiration lies rather in the greatness of his trust in the eternal order of the world, and the gladness of his obedience to its laws as revealed in the reason and conscience of man. And the secret of his strength, to hearten trust and stimulate obedience, was in the emotional impulse which his character and personality gave to his words. Emerson does not argue. He never tries to prove that the Power which lives and works in the great world is wise and good, and therefore may be trusted; he never labours to convince men that it is reasonable to obey the dictates of their higher nature, as being the voice of God speaking in the deep silence of the soul. He is no theorist or theological lecturer. He speaks directly from his own experience to ours. He has seen that man lies embosomed in Nature, the child of its eternal spirit. He has felt that the energies of spiritual being surround and penetrate the human soul and claim its trust and obedience; he has surrendered to their supporting and directing grace; and in following the guidance thus secured, has found life good and beautiful and wise. Out of this knowledge and experience he speaks; his convictions strive to shape themselves in words, and often with success so great that his sayings seem to flash and glow with the fires of insight, emotion and faith.

"There is a statement of religion possible, which would render all scepticism absurd," he once wrote. And in his essay on "The Over-Soul" he perhaps attempted to make that statement, and sometimes one thinks that he has come as near to making it there as any modern writer has yet come. But it is not in any one or more utterances of his that the highest truth he stood for finds most sure expression. That truth is borne in upon us from his own life and its spiritual unfoldings, when we apprehend these in the unity and integrity of their prophetic conviction. The sincerity and serenity and courage with which he listened to, trusted, and obeyed the divine voice in his own heart, and the frankness with which he uttered the experience thus obtained, become, as it were an impassioned witness to that faith which, for many at least, may render all final scepticism, in the divinity and harmony of life, absurd. No man ever spoke more directly from the soul's inmost feeling and conviction; and there are sentences of his so charged with the vital truth of religion that, on reading them, one wants to hold them in the mind, as some poor delver for gold might clasp the nugget of ore which promised affluence for him through all after years. And yet, even as I am about to quote these, I hear his warning voice: "Listen no to me; treasure not my words; listen to Him who spake to me, for He speaks to thee also." The best teacher, Emerson believed, is the man who commends us to our own deepest thought, who helps us to hear God speaking within, and to trust and obey that voice with cheerful courage. "The faith that stands on authority is not faith. The reliance on authority measures the decline of religion, the withdrawal of the soul." The power of inspiration in Emerson is the power to make us feel that we may be inspired of the same spirit that inspired him. He kindles faith in us by the gleam of faith that flashes forth from his own mind. He wakens us from inward sleep. He calls on us to make the great appeal to our own divinity. His thought stirs and stimulates ours, and bids us turn to the silence within and listen there and fearlessly obey.

The soul gives itself, alone, original and pure, to the Lonely, Original, and Pure, who, on that condition, gladly inhabits, leads, speaks through it. Then is it glad, young, and nimble. . . . Behold, it saith, I am born into the great, the universal mind. I, the imperfect, adore my own Perfect. I am somehow made receptive of the great Soul, and thereby do overlook the sun and stars, and feel them to be the fair accidents and effects which change and pass. More and more the surges of everlasting nature enter into me, and I become public and human in my regards and actions. So come I to live in thoughts, and act with energies, which are immortal. Thus, revering the soul, and learning as the ancient said, that "its beauty is immense," man will come to see that the world is the perennial miracle which the soul worketh, and be less astonished at particular wonders; he will learn that there is no profane history; that all history is sacred; that the universe is represented in an atom, in a moment of time. He will weave no longer a life of shreds and patches, but he will live with a divine unity. He will cease from what is base and frivolous in his life, and be content with all places, and with any service he can render. He will calmly front the morrow in the negligency of that trust which carries God with it, and so hath already the whole future in the bottom of the heart.

Words such as these cannot be other than inspired; they come straight from the heart which has been purged of all selfishness and vain desire, and in lowliness and love has surrendered to the powers of the Spirit in whom it lives and rejoices and rests.

And he who wrote thus held it true that every man may know, according to his faith, that same inspiring. For to Emerson this universe was a sacred unity of spirit; the Spiritual was the Real; and of that Real we all partake. Let us then know our heritage and be faithful. "Ineffable is the union of man and God in every act of the soul." "When we have broken our god of tradition and ceased from our god of rhetoric, then may God fire the heart with His presence." "When a man lives with God his voice shall be sweet as the murmur of the brook and the rustle of the ripening corn."

Often it shall seem to the reader of Emerson that his religion of lowly trust and plastic obedience is a kind of quietism, a renouncing of the will, a passive surrender to the Unseen Powers. We have not so much to act as to be acted on. Man is an organ of the great soul. Emerson resorts to all kinds of metaphors to express his thought of man's dependence and submission.

"From within or from behind, a light shines through us upon things, and makes us aware that we are nothing, but the light is all." "A man is the façade of a temple wherein all wisdom and good abide." "Man is a stream whose source is hidden. Our being is descending into us from we know not whence." "I am constrained every moment to acknowledge a higher origin for events than the will I call mine."

But if, when thus we seem to be losing self-soul in the ocean of spirit, and there is nothing left but the "wise silence," the "lowly listening," the passive surrender, we turn to the essay on "Character" or on "Self-Reliance," lo! we find ourselves called on to act with all the energy and ardour of beings whose work must be done ere they can be released, or know life's real joy. Every man has his place and his part in the world's vast activity, and at his peril shall he shun that place or shirk that part. "The power which resides in him is new in Nature, and none but he knows what that is which he can do, nor does he know till he has tried." "A man is relieved and gay when he has put his heart into his work and done his best; but what he has said or done otherwise shall give him no peace." Very terrible can this lowly believer become in demanding action and achievement. "Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind. Absolve yourself to yourself, and you shall have the suffrage of the world." "Trust thyself; every heart vibrates to that iron string." "Let a man know his worth, and keep things under his feet. Let him not peep or steal, or skulk up and down with the air of a charity-boy, in a world which exists for him." And then when we think that he has carried us into the realm of sheer individualism or personal conceit, he will recall us with the words, "That self-reliance, which is the height and perfection of a man's nature, is—reliance on God."

This, then, is the religion of Emerson. Here, at least, are some of the elements of its awakening and recuperative power. To greatly trust, to cheerfully obey, to laboriously toil, as being original and elect sons of the Highest, each one of us needed by Him, touched and informed by His spirit, and granted no liberty and no release except that of following to the uttermost limit of faithfulness the Destiny of our own Ideal.

And yet there is something more, if only one knew how to say it. There is an impression which Emerson sometimes leaves on the mind—an emotion which the mention of his name will kindle, that eludes all definition. We are conscious of his limitations; we are aware of his paradoxes, perhaps confusions, of thought. And yet he moves us as greater minds, as profounder thinkers, as even holier saints, do not. We must say that, for him, religion is but another word for inspiration; it begins and ends in enthusiasm; it is the rapture of the soul in presence of life's redundancy and overflowing grace. There is in Nature, he tells us, an "excess of life which in conscious beings we call ecstasy." It is this that makes religion—the possession of something more than we really have, the being possessed by an Ideal, which the actual for ever frustrates and denies, but which is more real than that actual, and a more certain treasure than all the wealth which the powers of sense can yield. . . "So far as we can trace the natural history of the soul, its health consists in the fulness of its reception—call it piety, call it veneration—in the fact that enthusiasm is organised therein." Life, indeed, is a patient performance of homely duty, a brave endurance, a meek and lowly renouncement. But it is also a rapture of love and praise, an ecstasy of God, a sublime joy in the affluence and splendour of existence. "The soul is in her native realm, and it is wider than space, older than time, wide as hope, rich as love. Pusillanimity and fear she refuses with a beautiful scorn: they are not for her who putteth on her coronation robes and goes forth through universal love to universal power."

W. J. JUPP.

EMERSON'S THEISM.

EVER since the year 1847, when as a youth just leaving school I listened with eager attention to the lectures on "Representative Men" which Emerson delivered in the Mechanics' Institution in Manchester, the writings of this great seer have been to me a rich source of inspiration and delight. "Nature," the two series of "Essays" and the earlier volume of Poems were for years my favourite books, and to them I owed quite a new birth in my philosophical and religious life. I was indeed so engrossed by the ideas in those works which gave me the light which my soul was craving, that I passed over without much attention some passages in Emerson's writings which always rather repelled me, thinking that in all probability my mental antagonism to them was simply due to my imperfect apprehension of their real meaning. But before attempting to explain what it was that in later life caused me to somewhat qualify my intense admiration, let me first dwell on the vastly more important fact, and describe with fervent gratitude the immense positive benefit which I, in common doubtless with myriads of readers, owe to Emerson's uplifting ideas.

The preaching to which I had listened in my early years had represented God as a Creator and Father, infinitely wiser and more perfect than earthly fathers are, yet nevertheless related to his human offspring in much the same external way in which earthly parents are related to their children. But this kind of teaching was growing more and more unsatisfactory to my mind, and I found myself continually asking if earthly fathers are not self-existent, but are called into existence by some deeper reality, why should not this supremely wise and good Father also require a self-existent ground and cause for his presence in the Cosmos? My mind and heart cried out for a God who is in his essence self-existent, and who in this character reveals Himself directly in man's inner life. Looking into my inner life I found there no such higher and greater person as the preacher spoke of, but I did find there the distinct presence of a reality utterly unlike all finite and created existences, and which seemed to somehow give me what I wanted. It was not, however, till I listened to Emerson and dwelt with glowing interest on his inspired pages that the truth clearly flashed into my mind, and I saw that the self-existent God I yearned for was daily present with me and more closely embraced within my conscious life than any human person could possibly be. I saw in fact that in the ideals of Truth, Beauty, Righteousness and Love I enjoyed a partial but most genuine communion with and insight into the Absolute, the Real, the Self-existent; that here I had an actual glimpse of that Eternal Being, whose self-revelation in us is at once the standard of all righteous conduct and the object of all reverence and worship. I needed not to ask who made this Divinity who thus invades and illumines our secret consciousness, for his very presence assures us that He is uncreate and eternal, that here we are in the presence of the Absolute Reality out of whom all created existences must proceed; who is immanent and active all through the evolution of the cosmos, and who, when the fitting stage of organisation has been reached, reveals for the first time Himself and his character in the self-consciousness of his rational creatures. Here, then, under the guidance of the seer of Concord, I found the true God, the self-existent mind and heart "of which all sincere conversation is the worship, and to which all right action is submission." It is Emerson's vivid discernment of the unescapable presence of this "third party" in all the social, political and spiritual relations of men which causes his pages to sparkle with precious aphorisms of practical wisdom, and which gives to his treatment of the most secular subjects a certain religious character.

We distinguish (he says) the announcements of the soul, its manifestations of its own nature, by the term Revelation. These are always attended by the emotion of the sublime. For this communication is an influx of the Divine mind into our mind. It is an ebb of the individual rivulet before the flowing surges of the sea of life. Every distinct apprehension of this central commandment agitates men with awe and delight. A thrill passes through all men at the reception of new truth, or at the performance of a great action, which comes out of the heart of nature.

The question now arises whether Emerson's conception of the relation between the human and the Divine mind is such as to justify us in placing him in the theistic rather than in the pantheistic class of great religious thinkers. To his friend Professor Henry Ware, and probably to most of the Unitarians who listened to his magnificent "Address" in 1838, it seemed that the language Emerson there used was wholly incompatible with theistic belief.

If (says Professor H. Ware) the moral universe is founded on the principles of righteousness, truth, love, these principles are not the Deity; there must be some Being to put in action these principles, to exercise these attributes. To call the principles and the attributes God, is to violate the established use of language, and to confound the common apprehensions of mankind. It is in vain to hope by so doing to escape the charge of atheism; there is no other atheism conceivable. There is a personal God, or there is none.

Professor Ware seems to me to have failed to notice that in Emerson's view the ideals of truth, righteousness and love are not simply what Professor Ware calls "attributes," that is to say, modes of God's activity, they are features of the very essence of God's being. If they were what Professor Ware means by attributes, we could only know God inferentially as we infer the nature of another human person; and such acquaintance with God would necessarily be both uncertain and inadequate. Happily for us, when we surrender ourselves to the divine promptings, we distinctly feel that we are immediately cognisant of the eternal and essential reality, and that in a very true and all-important sense we have become in a measure "partakers" of the very life of God.

A short time before he delivered the celebrated "Address" he was asked by some of the Harvard students to enlighten them as to his view of the personality of God, and his reply was:—

I say that I cannot find, when I explore my own consciousness, any truth in saying that God is a person, but the reverse. I feel that there is some profanation in saying that he is personal. To represent him as an individual is to shut him out of my consciousness. He is then but a great man, such as the crowd worships. . . . I say that here we feel at once that we have no language; the words are only auxiliary and not adequate, are suggestions and not copies of our cogitation. I deny personality to God because it is too little, not because it is too much. Life, personal life, is faint and cold compared with the energy of God. For Reason and Love and Beauty, or that which is all these—it is the Life of life, the Reason of reason, the Love of love.

This does not appear to differ essentially from the view to which Martineau gives expression when he calls God "the Soul of souls," nor does his objection to calling God "personal" amount, I think, to much more than what Lotze meant when he said that the idea of personality as we find it in man is wholly inadequate to express the nature of the self-existent God, that human personalities are essentially imperfect and defective, and that it is only in God's nature where the Ideal becomes identical with the Real, that defects and limitations vanish and the perfection of personality is found. But it is evident such personality as Lotze ascribes to God is wholly inconceivable by us, and therefore it is that Emerson felt a very intelligible dislike to the application of this term to the Eternal. Still it seems clear that Emerson denied personality to God simply because in his view this word carries with it conceptions of dependence and limitation which are intrinsically inapplicable to the self-existent and infinite God; and from many passages in his writings, such as his description of God as the "Divine Mind," it appears clear that Mr. Cabot is in the right when he says: "If the mark of personality be self-consciousness, Emerson did not deny this to the Supreme Being."

But while I feel, no doubt, that Emerson's position is genuinely theistic, I venture to think that his theism tends at times to lapse into an unmoral pantheism by reason of a doctrine which, it must be admitted, he holds in common with the majority of prominent philosophical writers at the present time. This doctrine is thus expressed in the Essay on "Experience":—"Saints are sad, because they behold Sin from the point of the view of the Conscience and not of the Intellect. . . . The Intellect names it shade, absence of light, and no essence. The Conscience must feel it as essence, essential evil. This it is not; it has an objective existence, but no subjective." In thus setting the intellect over against the conscience and making the claims of the former paramount, Emerson appears to me to misinterpret the moral experiences of the soul. If a tendency to sensationalism and utilitarianism is the besetting weakness of the Anglo-Saxon race on this side of the Atlantic, the weakness on the American side seems to be in the direction of exaggerating the authority of the intellect; and notwithstanding Emerson's rich imagination, I agree with Walt Whitman that his genius suffers somewhat from a too dominating "intellectuality."

Because the exercise by the soul of a power of free choice between self and the immanent God in seasons of temptation cannot be scientifically explained by the intellect, the intellect denies the real existence of such an alternative, and thus undermines the metaphysical basis of such essential ethical and religious ideas as merit and demerit, sin, repentance, and reconciliation with God. But this subordination of the conscience to the intellect always brings with it serious consequences, as Emerson's writings most clearly show. The chief of these is the depreciation of the value of Personality. The Intellect may be content with principles and ideas; the Conscience and the Heart emphasise the supreme value of Persons. Fortunately Emerson is no slave to consistency. When his intellectualism is dominant he writes the poem "Brahma," or tells us that we are "but floating foam-bells along thought's causing stream," and announces the principle that "the soul knows no persons"; but in the deeper moments of his life, when he recognises the self-revelation of God in the conscience and the heart, as well as in the intellect, he sees that persons are infinitely precious alike to man and to God, that

What is excellent
As God lives is permanent,
Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain,
Heart's love will meet thee again.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Accrington.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday, May 10, by the Rev. R. T. Herford, B.A., of Stand, morning and evening. In the afternoon there was a special service for young people. Appropriate hymns and anthems were sung by the choir and scholars. Mr. Herford gave an address. The services were bright and hearty; the congregations good. The collections in aid of the church funds amounted to over £12, showing an advance on last year.

Blackpool: South Shore.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 10, and were successful in every way. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes conducted the services, and gave two excellent sermons to good congregations. The hall was beautifully decorated with plants and flowers.

Bolton: Bank-street and Halliwell-road.—Mr. John Evans, B.A., senior student of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, has been unanimously appointed assistant minister to the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B, in succession to the Rev. E. S. Hicks, M.A. Mr. Evans will begin his duties on the first Sunday in July.

Cardiff.—On Monday last, May 18, the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., who is conducting the services at West Grove Church during the month of May, delivered a most impressive lecture, entitled "A Visit to India." Mr. Frederick Childs, the Chairman of the Church Committee, presided over a moderate attendance. The lecture bristled with points of interest, and also contained many humorous passages, which were much appreciated, and concluded with an account of the origin and objects of the Brahmo-Somaj movement in India. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer on the proposition of Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson, seconded by Mr. T. Yates.

Chesterfield.—On Sunday, May 10, the annual flower services at Elder-yard Chapel were conducted by the Rev. P. Dean, of Loughborough, who spoke in the morning on "The Lessons of the Flowers," and in the evening on "Springtime's Renewal." The large choir, under Mr. Hubert Blackshaw, the organist, rendered special anthems in a very effective way. There was a fairly good attendance in the morning, and at night the chapel was filled in almost every seat.

Chichester.—On Sunday last Mr. T. Clark (ex-Congregational minister and office bearer in local Congregational church) kindly officiated during the temporary absence of the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott. This is not the first time that Mr. Clark has conducted the services with great acceptance.

Colwyn Bay and Windermere.—The Missionary Conference Committee has decided to resume Sunday services at these holiday resorts during the summer months. Last year the results of the effort at Colwyn Bay did not equal expectation owing mainly to the failure of the season at that and other places on the Welsh coast. Subject to the necessary financial encouragement from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the services will be resumed, but in the Public Hall, not in the Pavilion on the pier. At Windermere also a change will be made in the place of meeting. As the Institute is not available, the Albert Hall in Cross-street, close to the railway station, has been secured, and services will be commenced there in June and continued until September.

Darlington.—Special services were conducted on Sunday last by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, of London. The little church was well filled on both occasions by attentive congregations.

Halifax.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held on Sunday, May 3. In the morning the Rev. Henry Rawlings, M.A., of York, conducted the service. In the afternoon a service of song, "Ralph Waldo Emerson," was sung by the scholars. The Rev. Philip E. Richards, B.A., gave the readings. "The Story of the Life of Emerson," with selections from some of his writings, was compiled by the Rev. F. E. Millson, and the hymns were mostly written by Emerson. The evening service was conducted by Mr. Rawlings. The choir sang anthems both morning and evening, the musical arrangements being under the direction of Mr. A. Wilson, the organist. There were good congregations all day, the collections being a slight increase on last year. On Monday evening Mr. Rawlings lectured in the chapel on "William Penn, Quaker and Coloniser." At the close of the lecture, which was both interesting and instructive, a vote of thanks was given to Mr. Rawlings, on the motion of Mr. Sagar, seconded by Mr. Nicholson. The collections for the anniversary and lecture amounted to £27 13s. 4½d.

Heaton Moor.—On May 11 a meeting of the congregation was held to receive reports from Mrs. Hans Renold and the Rev. Priestley Prime, the delegates appointed to attend the National Conference at Liverpool. Many questions were asked and answered, and a very interesting discussion took place, the wish being expressed for further opportunities of conference on some of the questions suggested. Mr. Walter Higginbottom, who was recently appointed chairman of the congregation, presided.

London: Mansford-street.—A special service will be held on Sunday next, May 24, at 7 P.M., conducted by the Rev. John Ellis, to receive and suitably acknowledge gifts in memory of the late Miss E. J. Garrett. The memorial gifts are a mural panel in opus sectile, a beautiful piece of work by Henry Holiday, illustrative of the text, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me," and an embroidered cloth for the communion table designed at the Royal School of Art Needlework, and worked by the younger members of Miss Garrett's class.

Loughborough.—The Rev. E. I Fripp, of Mansfield, conducted the anniversary services of the Victoria-street Sunday-school on Sunday, May 10 There were good congregations, and special music was rendered by the choir and scholars. On Monday night the scholars gave a service of song, entitled "The Musical Pickwick," in the school-room, before a good audience. The Rev. P. Dean presided, and Mr. Arthur Harding gave the connective readings in a way that gave much enjoyment to all present. Votes of thanks brought the very pleasant evening to a close.

Mottram.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held on the 10th inst., when the resident minister, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, was the preacher to large congregations, afternoon and evening, the chapel being filled at both services. The collections amounted to £20 8s., which is a considerable advance on recent years. In other ways real progress has been made since the commencement of the year. There are now 136 registered members compared with eighty up to the end of 1902, notwithstanding the fact that the registration fee has been doubled; the evening attendances have risen to an average of 150; the new "Essex Hall Hymnal" has been adopted in place of "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home." A Public Discussion Society has been established, with an average attendance of over 100; and four public lectures on "Unitarianism," delivered in public halls in the district, discussion invited, have stirred up much outside interest. In connection with these lectures the distribution of Unitarian tracts and leaflets, obtained by grant from the B. and F. U. Association, has also been of effective service.

Newchurch.—A heavy loss has been sustained through the death of Mr. Thomas Kenyon, one of the most valued and active members of the church, at the age of sixty-four years. For upwards of fifty years Mr. Kenyon had been connected both with church and school, and there was scarcely any office which, at one time or other, he had not filled. Last year he served the N.E.L.S.S. Union in the capacity of president, and as recently as April 25 read a paper at the Accrington Conference on "Music as an aid in School Work." As a teacher he knew how to impart sound instruction in a pleasant manner. Only when health began to fail did he resign the office of school superintendent, and to the last he took a deep interest in the singing class. Outside the circle of church interests he devoted himself whole-heartedly to whatever concerned the welfare of his fellow-man. The funeral took place on Friday afternoon, May 15, and was conducted by the minister, the Rev. J. J. Shaw, M.A., and the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, of Rawtenstall. A large number of friends and residents attended, both on this occasion and on Sunday morning last, when a memorial service was held.

Nottingham.—On Saturday, May 9, the members of the High Pavement Historical Society made an excursion to Lincoln for the purpose of viewing the Cathedral. This was the first trip of the season, and had been suggested by a lecture previously given before the society by Mr. Harry Gill. The party was met at the Cathedral by the Dean (the Very Rev. E. C. Wickham, D.D.), who kindly acted as guide. The trip, despite the unfavourable weather, was greatly enjoyed, upwards of seventy members and friends joining the party.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—The spring conference was held in the Unitarian Church, Darlington, on Monday, May 18, presided over by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, in the absence of Alderman Baxter Ellis, J.P., who had met with a serious accident at Alnmouth. A paper was read by the Rev. Henry Cross, of Stockton, on "How to Aid our Sunday Schools and other Young People's Institutions," which provoked considerable discussion, and resulted in a resolution being carried that the committee of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association be requested to appoint a sub-committee to take into consideration the proposal contained in the paper—that a Sunday School Union be formed for the district. A public meeting was held in the evening, presided over by Mr. Lambelle. Addresses were given by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, Frank Walters, and H. Cross. The meetings were well attended. Tea was provided by the ladies of the Darlington congregation, to whom, and to the speakers, a hearty vote of thanks was given Sidmouth.—The funeral of Mrs. Yelland, widow of the late Rev. Robert Yelland, formerly for ten years minister of the Old Meeting, took place on Saturday, May 16, in perfect weather and amid beautiful surroundings. Though frail and burdened with the weight of years, Mrs. Yelland had regularly attended up to the last the services at the Old Meeting, and though of late necessarily leading a quiet, secluded life, she was greatly respected by her many friends for her gentle and affectionate disposition, and a character devoid of all malice, sustained by an assured faith in God. Many tokens of respect and love were laid upon her grave. An appropriate service was conducted on Sunday morning by the Rev. W. Agar, who preached from the words, "In quietness and confidence shall be thy strength."

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

VIDIMUS

of "The Black Familiars,"

By the Publishers of

"THE CHRISTIAN WORLD."

"Our new story, by L. B. Walford, which began last week, is out of the beaten track. The time is the early years of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when Roman Catholicism still kept some foothold in the country, and was not without hopes of a fresh return of England to the Roman fold. We are introduced to the Roman Catholic family of Lord Delaval, at Delaval Castle, near the Hamoshire coast. Lady Delaval is a stately Dame, of magnificent presence, of masculine mind, and a bold plotter to gain her ends. The only child, Katherine, is a winsome English rose, the heiress and hope of the Delavals. Lady Delaval is devoted to 'the old religion'; Katherine is of an inquiring mind, and has inclinations towards Lutheranism. The problem with Lady Delaval is how to secure the Delaval estates in the event either of a re-establishment of Romanism, or of Romanism being stamped out by a more thoroughgoing Protestantism. Katherine is the card she means to play, regardless of Katherine's wishes or happiness. Starting from this situation, Mrs. Walford develops her plot with the skill of a practised teller of tales. We get at once into the atmosphere of intrigue, but it is an atmosphere oxygenised with plenty of piquant comedy. Father Eustace, the Delaval domestic chaplain, and the Abbot of an Abbey that has escaped dissolution, play important parts in the story. They are the 'Black Familiars.' Then there is a young Elizabethan Court dandy, who wears his fortune on his back. He is drawn with a detail that bespeaks close study of the type. There are charming pictures of country life, and dainty scenes in 'my lady's chamber.' The costumes and manners of the period are pictured in a way that will interest our lady readers. We believe 'The Black Familiars' will be regarded as a highly successful experiment in out-of-the-way Elizabethan romance."

THE LIVERPOOL TEMPERANCE PUBLIC-HOUSE COMPANY, LIMITED.

Issue of 5,000 ORDINARY SHARES of 10s. each at par.

Payable—1s. per Share on application, 2s. 6d. per Share on allotment, and the balance in calls not exceeding 1s. per Share.

DIRECTORS.

William Benjamin Bowring, 20, Castle-street, Liverpool, merchant.

Harold Coventry, 19, Sweeting-street Liverpool, metal merchant.

John Edwards, 51, Russian-drive, Liverpool, iron merchant.

Philip Henry Holt, 52, Ullet-road, Liverpool, ship-owner.

Harriet Mary Johnson, 10, Eastfield-drive, Liverpool, spinster.

Thomas Lloyd Jones, 4, Dingle-lane, Liverpool, minister.

Andre Leonard Melly, 7, Rumford-place, Liverpool, cotton broker.

The Company has been formed for the promotion of temperance by providing refreshment houses of a character which shall be entirely up-to-date, and from which the sale, consumption, or dealing with intoxicants in any way by the Company will be prohibited.

The Company proposes to open Temperance Public-houses, Hotels, Reading and other similar Rooms, Stalls, and Premises, where meals can be obtained freed from the inevitable surroundings of the ordinary public-house.

The Company also proposes to take over Public-houses where the licence has been refused by the licensing authorities and to open Temperance Public-houses, particularly in the neighbourhood of parks, tramway and other termini, docks, works, and yards.

The leading features of the management of the Company's houses and business will be as follows:—

(a) To make every house so clean, comfortable, and attractive as to compete successfully with licensed houses in the neighbourhood, and to ensure continuing custom.

(b) To supply only the best and most wholesome refreshments procurable, in generous quantity and at moderate price.

(c) To serve everything in an attractive and appetising manner.

Commodious premises have been secured at the corner of Park-street and Mill-street, in which, after considerable alterations have been effected, the Company proposes to commence business. The site is an admirable one, having frontages on two main thoroughfares, and is close to the docks. A music-hall is next door, and a flour mill and other works are in the immediate neighbourhood.

In each year such dividend—after provision has been made for the payment of interest at the rate of Three per cent. on the Debentures, and for setting aside part of the net profits of the Company for a Reserve Fund, for the repayment of Debentures, for depreciation of the Company's properties, and for other contingencies and subject thereto—as the directors may determine, but not exceeding Three per cent. shall be paid to the Ordinary Shareholders until the Reserve Fund has exceeded the money advanced on Debentures, or the Debentures have been redeemed, and depreciation and other contingencies provided for, but such dividend shall never exceed £5 per cent.

As a precaution against the risk of shares passing into the hands of holders who might be desirous of changing the policy of the Company, power is reserved to the directors by the Memorandum and Articles of Association to refuse to register any transfer of shares, whether fully paid or otherwise.

This advertisement is not and must not be treated as a prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or invitation offering to the public for subscription or purchase any shares of the Company. Attention is invited to the full prospectus, which is ready and can be obtained at the Registered Office of the Company.

Copies of the Company's Memorandum and Articles of Association, Sub-Contract for the Purchase of Mill-street Premises, and proposed Debentures, may be seen at the Registered Offices of the Company, on or before the closing of the lists of subscription, between the hours of 10 A.M. and 4 P.M., Saturday 10—1, where prospectuses and forms of application can be obtained.

Secretary and Registered Office: B. P. BURROUGHS.
19, Sweeting-street, Liverpool.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whit-week were fully advertised in our last number. At Mr. Augustine Birrell's lecture on Emerson, on Tuesday evening, Essex Hall promises to be crowded out. Admission is strictly by ticket. We trust that on Wednesday morning also there will be no vacant place in Little Portland-street Chapel, when the annual sermon is to be preached by the Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., of Ann Arbour, our welcome visitor and representative of the American Unitarian Association.

IN the book-room at Essex Hall will be found copies of many new books, to which we should be glad to draw attention. A charming little edition of Emerson's "Divinity School Address," with an admirable portrait, has been brought out as a memento of the centenary, and from America has just come a new "Life of Channing," by the Rev. J. W. Chadwick. The seven volumes of Mr. Charles Booth's new work may be also seen, and a number of recent works by our American brethren. We ought to have published before now reviews of Mr. Carpenter's "Bible in the Nineteenth Century," and the most welcome volume of "Studies in Theology," in which he and Mr. Wicksteed have gathered up a number of their most striking lectures and addresses. But there the books are, and they really require no commendation from us.

ANOTHER five hundred copies of the National Conference Report are being printed, and when these are exhausted (which will probably be at once) friends who still want copies must fall back upon the two numbers of THE INQUIRER. Of April 25 there are plenty to be had; of May 2 not so many, and they had better be secured by those who want them. We are glad to hear that Messrs. Dent and Co. are publishing Dr. Hunter's paper on "A Worshipful Church" in a revised form, as a little shilling book.

ON Saturday last a demonstration was made in Hyde Park by Nonconformists and others who are opposed to the Education Act of last year, and the Bill of this. The general testimony is that so formidable a display of political disaffection has not been seen in this country for many years. Unlike most Hyde Park meetings this one was specially characterised by religious fervour. Ministers and congregations went together to the Park, and hymns suitable to the occasion were raised again and again. It seems as if the demonstrators had a foresight of the collapse of the main provisions of the London Bill which has come about since; at any rate, they confined their attention chiefly to the injustice inflicted on the public, not merely Nonconformists, by the saddling of the denominational schools upon the rates, and the exclusion of all but one type of teacher from headships in publicly-maintained schools. This injustice is extended by the London Bill, and must be remedied as soon as possible. Our friends will observe that a resolution on the subject will be submitted at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association next Wednesday.

THE "Passive Resistance" movement appears to be slowly but surely assuming proportions that will prove serious before long. Mr. Balfour characteristically speaks as if it were an eccentricity confined to a few obscure persons, but the probability is that he will soon discover his mistake. We have no sturdier citizens than those who have decided upon this method of protest against what they feel to be a flagrant wrong, and those of us who prefer the ordinary constitutional methods of protest must admit that the circumstances are not encouraging for us. Meanwhile the Government is acting by a majority obtained on the war policy, and on that alone. Moreover, its working majority on the present Education Bill, as it was on last year's, has been largely secured by an obvious understanding with the Irish members; and, even allowing for a certain amount of genuine catholic sympathy with the policy adopted, that in itself does not tend to lessen the exasperation felt by the suffering Nonconformists. We certainly think that, in spite of the Prime Minister's indifference, there is trouble ahead—not least that deepening of sectarian animosity which is the despair of truly liberal minds.

THE annual meeting of the Churchmen's Union was held at the Church House, Westminster, on Monday afternoon, the President, the Rev. Dr. Morrison, in the chair. The report, which was read by the Secretary, Rev. W. Manning, stated that it had been decided that the first object of the Union should be thus defined: "To maintain the right and duty of the Church to re-state her belief from time to time as required by the progressive revelations of the Holy Spirit." To re-state the Christian faith, the report said, was a supremely difficult task, but it must be undertaken if Christianity was to live. It was a matter of sincere regret that one of their lecturers, the Dean of Ripon, in his attem pt to re-state some points of Christian doctrine, hardly met with the forbearance and tolerance to which he was entitled. It was only in an atmosphere of freedom that Christian thought and scholarship could worthily serve the supreme interests of the Church by re-adjusting the sacred heritage of the past to the demands of the present. The President, speaking of the work of the Union, said that in his judgment the ultimate basis of true Christian religion was a belief in the moral order of the world resting on experience of that order as a fact, just as science rested on the fact of experience of the physical order of the world. The adoption of the report was moved by Lord Avebury, seconded by Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, supported by Sir Edward Russell, Professor Gardner, and Canon Henson, and unanimously passed.

OF the Emerson Commemoration in Boston and Concord and other American cities, we shall look for the reports with the keenest interest. Most significant of all was perhaps the laying of the foundation stone of an Emerson Memorial Hall at Harvard, for the department of philosophy, for which £30,000 has been subscribed. In many of our pulpits memorial sermons were preached last Sunday, and in the past weeks many special sermons and lectures have been devoted to Emerson. Our own centenary articles are completed this week, and it will be seen that in them very various degrees of appreciation and criticism are represented.

IN connection with the Emerson Centenary, a "Memorial School" is to be held in Boston and Concord during July. Thirty lectures dealing with various aspects of Emerson's life and work are to be given, the morning lectures in Concord, the evening lectures in Boston. The school is to open on Monday, July 13, and particulars as to tickets, &c., may be obtained from the secretary, Mr. David Greene Haskins, Jr., 5, Tremont-street, Boston, Mass. The following partial list of the lectures and addresses will give an idea of the broad character and scope of the school:—President J. G. Schurman, "The Philosophy of Emerson"; Frank R. Sanborn, "Emerson and the Concord School of Philosophy"; Rev. S. M. Crothers, "The Poetry of Emerson"; William M. Salter, "Emerson's Aim and Method in Social Reform"; Rev. Charles F. Dole, "Emerson the Puritan"; Dr. Edward W. Emerson, "The Religion of Emerson"; Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, "Emerson and Harvard"; Charles Malloy, "The Sphinx"; William Lloyd Garrison, "Emerson and the Anti-Slavery Movement"; Moorfield Storey, "Emerson and the Civil War"; Rev. B. F. Trueblood, "Emerson and the Inner Light"; Rev. John W. Chadwick, "The Simpler Emerson"; Henry D. Lloyd, "Emerson's Wit and Humour"; Percival Chubb, "Emerson's Spiritual Leadership in England"; Prof. Kuno Francke, "Emerson's Debt to Germany and Germany's Debt to Emerson"; George Willis Cooke, "Emerson and the Transcendental Movement"; William R Thayer, "Emerson's Gospel of Individualism;" Prof. Charles F. Richardson, "Emerson's Place in American Literature"; Rabbi Charles Fleischer, "Emerson, the Seer of Democracy"; Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, "Emerson and Carlyle"; Rev. R. Heber Newton, "Emerson the Man." Other addresses will be by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Dr. Francis E. Abbott, Joel Benton, and Prof. Nathaniel Schmidt.

FROM a leading article on the Emerson Centenary in the Manchester Guardian of May 25, we take the following passage:—

Nothing is more remarkable in Emerson than his union of a spiritual idealism which may be Greek or German with the shrewd and alert practicality of Yankee New England. His mysticism works in alliance with the coolest and keenest common sense. He is never really "in the clouds"; he is never really detached; if he ever seems to be, it is because his profound feeling for affinities triumphantly bridges gulfs which his readers have been accustomed to think impassable. If he soars to the stars, we may depend upon it he is hitching some waggon there. Hence the intimate place which Emerson has won and maintained in the hearts of the whole American people. A voice almost impersonal in its purity, he is yet a distinctively American voice. He speaks Plato and Goethe, if we will, but their mellow thought emerges in him irradiated as with the dewy freshness of a New England dawn. He has become incorporated in the moral consciousness of the American people. "His essential teaching," wrote Charles Eliot Norton in a private letter to Emerson's excellent English biographer, Dr. Garnett, "has become part of the unconsciously acquired creed of every young American of good and gracious nature."

THOSE of our friends who hope to attend the International meeting at Amsterdam in September will find a special interest in the Loan Collection of the Works of Early and Modern Painters of the Dutch School now at the Guildhall. Among the modern artists, the work of Josef Israels is specially striking. Among the early masters represented are Rembrandt, Cuyp, Hobbema, Paul Potter and Franz Hals.

IN the report of the Deaconess Institute of the Free Methodist Churches the secretary says: "Some of the sisters preach the Gospel. The committee make no apology for this. From the first they have believed that women as well as men should get the pattern of their life from God, and in determining their vocation bear in mind that the talent is the call. When the committee found that some sisters possessed great evangelistic gifts they recognised therein the wisdom and goodness of God, and made special arrangement that each sister might, in this direction, fulfil the spiritual destiny of which God had made her capable."

THE BODY OF ENGLISH PRESBYTERIAN MINISTERS IN AND ABOUT THE CITIES OF LONDON AND WESTMINSTER.—At a meeting of this body held on the 12th inst., at Dr. William's Library—the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., in the chair—the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

That this meeting of the body of English Presbyterian ministers in and about the cities of London and Westminster would urge upon the attention of the Government of this country the grave issues that are now arising in many parts of the world with reference to the relations of the advanced to the backward races of mankind, and the danger of the re-introduction, under new forms, of many of the horrors of the slave trade, which the awakened conscience of Europe repudiated nearly a century ago. In particular, the meeting would press upon the attention of the Government the duties which arise in the face of the charges brought against the administration of the Congo Free State, which exists under international guarantee to which this country is a responsible party; and further, it would implore the Government to keep such vigilant watch over the regulations of native labour in our possessions as may strengthen our hands, and give a pledge of our sincerity in such representations as we may make to other Powers.

That this meeting of the body of English Presbyterian ministers in and about the cities of London and Westminster enters an earnest protest:—

(i.) Against the injustice embodied in those provisions of the Education Act, 1902, whereby religious tests are perpetuated with regard to a large portion of the teaching profession in elementary schools; and

(ii.) Against the appropriation of public funds to the support of schools which are not under full public control.

And, further, the meeting deplores the proposed extension of these evils to the Metropolitan area by the Bill now before Parliament.

The Hon. Sec. (Rev. James Harwood, B.A.) was requested to forward copies of both resolutions to the Prime Minister and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman; also of the first to the Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs and the Colonies, and of the second to the Marquess of Londonderry and Sir William Anson.

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.—The fourth annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday morning, May 21, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, president, in the chair. The annual report expressed much satisfaction at the good done by the Society during the past year and at the improved financial position. The amount standing to the credit of the Society was £286 5s. 11d. Fourteen new members were elected, bringing the total membership up to 109. Resolutions of sympathy were adopted consequent upon the death of the Rev. E. S. Anthony, and the continued illness of the Rev. T. Leyland. The Rev. C. C. Coe was elected president for the ensuing year. The treasurer (Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A.) and secretary (Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.D.) were re-elected. Vacancies on the Committee were filled by the election of Revs. J. A. Pearson and S. A. Steinthal. Mr. A. E. Piggott, F.S.A.A., and Rev. W. R. Shanks were re-elected as auditors, and Mr. John Dendy as legal adviser.

The members had luncheon together, and at the afternoon session, to which ministers of the district, not members, were also invited, the Rev. C. T. Poynting, B.A., presided. A paper on "Ministerial Qualifications and Church Needs" was read by Rev. J. Arthur Pearson. In selecting this subject for discussion, the Committee had in view the present unsatisfactory method of bringing about ministerial settlements. A passage in the annual report said:—"If some method could be devised of bringing suitable ministers and congregations together, so as to save the lamentable mistakes, the undignified scrambles, and the weary waitings, but too common, it would be great gain for both." Mr. Pearson followed along this line, and suggested that it was for such a society as the Ministerial Fellowship to call the necessary machinery into operation. It was mainly a ministerial concern, for the credit and better fulfilment of the work of the ministry. There was need of an Information Bureau to get the necessary particulars from ministers and from congregations, and an effective committee for this purpose might be formed by the Fellowship. Conducting its business with dignity and earnestness, it would in time secure the confidence of ministers and churches, and do more than had ever yet been done to save those heart-burnings, that confusion of face, those recriminations, that alienation from active religious life, which in the past had been responsible for so much ineffectiveness. Such a Committee, every year becoming more completely representative of the ministry of our group of churches, would be the agency best calculated to give congregations the right conception of any minister's qualifications, and ministers a due idea of the needs of the churches.

An interesting discussion followed, in which many ministers took part, and, ultimately, a resolution was passed referring the suggestions to the Committee for consideration and report.

YOU will find that the mere resolve not to be useless, and the honest desire to help other people, will, in the quickest and delicatest ways, improve yourself.

EMERSON'S "CONDUCT OF LIFE."

ONE of the paradoxes now being worn into platitudes is this, that the truly practical man is the mere theorist. If you want a radical remedy, go to the logician. He has the stoat-faculty of tracking persistently to the kill his selected quarry, whereas the man of affairs is always being lured off the trail by casual rabbits.

Like most of the popular paradoxes, this doctrine is more false than true. Thought is good, and we cannot have too much of it anywhere, but the logician is not necessarily the man of most thought; he is the man who in greatest measure is master of his thought. He coaxes it, marshals it, copulates it, employs it. The best thought may be also the least ductile. The strongest thought is that which masters the thinker and is not mastered by him. So if you penetrate the inarticulateness and inconsecutiveness of the practical man, you may divine in him a wisdom not yet reduced to terms, far less to syllogisms.

It does not follow that every illogical man is a sage; but it does come about that the greatest sages, and those who have scattered most intellectual yeast, are among the disorderly thinkers. Emerson is like the rest of them. He gives you no cunning goldsmith's work, but deals out nuggets from the heap by the shovelful. He made no headway at school or college, either in mathematics or philosophy. Every shallow leader-writer can display his matter more tactically than he. His ways of thought are not those of the trained thinker, but of the ordinary matter-of-fact person. As you listen to such an one, you shall hear the same dominant notions, two or three in number, coming up ever and again for utterance. The rest of his talk is mainly a descant on these themes, with interludes and digressions, and every kind of brokenness. So far as there is method in it at all, the method is not literary but musical. The musician is released from logic, and does not so much order his thought as record its spontaneous happening. It is to this everyday type of thinker that Emerson belongs. He represents this type raised to the sublime.

In quality Emerson's thought is always fine and always noble; in expressing it he has an uncanny union of surprise and clearness. He thinks like a musician and talks like a poet. His several sentences, which have no responsibility one towards another, take each its own symmetry. They will all stand up alone, so that no writer is so easy to quote. Nevertheless, Emerson retains the virtues of his type. He keeps near to the watch-fires of the human race. However much you may delight in the fantastic happiness of his wording, you cannot dismiss his thought as fantasy. It is too close akin to our unspoken faiths. To find it he has dug down under the commonplace, a little deeper, but in the same soil.

In these essays, which deal with practical wisdom, the advantage of the Emersonian method is at its greatest. No art could have bettered it. The previous question always seems to have been carried; the writer is not called on to procure your intellectual assent, he has it already. He does not convince, but impresses. At intervals his main themes emerge, rather by way of reminder than of new solicitation, and the welter of epigams between prepares you, somehow, to feel their truth more heartily at each repetition. One pleasant result of this fashion of writing is that a well-chosen clause will bring back to you the sentiment of a whole essay, as a bar of music may call up a whole sonata. Here, for instance, is the thematic index to the essay on Fate:—

> Whatever limits us, we call Fate. . . . So far as a man thinks, he is free. . . . Fate, then, is a name for facts not yet passed under the fire of thought; for causes which are unpenetrated.

How this may look to one who does not know Emerson, or this essay in particular, it is hard to guess; perhaps as uninspiring as its musical parallel to one who never heard the piece played. But in the memory of one who knows it well, does not the whole dissertation rise at this hint? So again, in the paper entitled "Power," these are the two main themes:—

> The key to all ages is—Imbecility. . . . Success goes thus invariably with a certain plus or positive power.

And for the comfort of the majority, the imbecile or minus people, we have a secondary movement, on the attainment of power:—

> Concentration is the secret of strength. . . . The second substitute for temperament is drill.

The essay which Emerson chose to call "Wealth," is a capital instance of his disorderly method and its practical efficiency. Two thirds of this paper are occupied with what looks like an attempt to outline a theory of economics. The remaining third describes the adventures of a literary man who dabbles (without vocation) in practical farming. Here is a stray sentence from the first part:—

> When the farmer's peaches are taken from under the tree, and carried into town, they have a new look, and a hundred-fold value over fruit which grew on the same bough and lies fulsomely on the ground. The craft of the merchant is this bringing a thing from where it abounds to where it is costly.

And this comes from the second part:—

> With brow bent, with firm intent, the pale scholar leaves his desk to draw a freer breath, and get a juster statement of his thought, in the garden-walk. He stoops to pull up a purslane, or a dock, that is choking the young corn, and finds there are two; close behind the last is a third; he reaches out his hand to a fourth; behind there are 4,000 and one. He is heated and untuned, and, by-and-by, wakes up from his idiot dream of chickweed and red-root, to remember his morning thought, and to find, that, with his adamantine purposes, he has been duped by a dandelion.

What then, is the object of the essay as a whole? It is really an instruction in the wise management of a narrow income. The first part has the task of impressing upon you the truth that "it is a peremptory part of virtue that a man's independence is secured." The second part, using the aforesaid adventures as so many parables, deduces five rules of action. When the whole is read again, with this key, the underlying intention of the composer can be felt in each movement.

Sometimes the spirit of an entire essay is found in a single phrase, such as this in "Behaviour": "The tell-tale body is all tongues"; or this in "Beauty": "Beauty is the form under which the intellect prefers to study the world." More frequently we find them answering to a theme. "Men talk of 'mere morality,' which is much as if one should say, 'Poor God, with nobody to help Him.'" To this, in the essay on "Worship" answers a phrase which needs much working out: "Work is victory."

This volume gives us in winsome form the concentrated essence of the good sense of good men. It is part of the general bible, the literature that sweetens the world. It is all the more forcible, no doubt, for its lack of logic. The challenge of the intellect is evaded, and the will is won through the affections and the conscience. But it is in the nature of this style that effects are reached by the balance of unreconciled opposites, and not by their solution. If any reader should cast up against Emerson a chance sentence or page which seems to contradict his message of courage and hope, let Emerson reply:—

> I have no fears of being forced in my own despite to play, as we say, the devil's attorney. . . . I am sure that a certain truth will be said through me, though I should be dumb, or though I should try to say the reverse. . . . We are of different opinions at different hours, but we always may be said to be at heart on the side of truth.

EMERSON'S "REPRESENTATIVE MEN."

I SUPPOSE the day has gone by for Emerson to be taken seriously as a teacher, even by those who consider inconsistency and unpunctuality as the first duties of genius. But there are times when we wait on oracles, and "a voice oracular" he sometimes is, and there are times when it is necessary to be unsaintly and profane, and he always "inspires an audacious mental habit." With me, at certain periods, Emerson is in bloom, like some jaunty flowers from which we get intense pleasure, but of a sort that must soon be over. I read him when he is in season, so to speak, but I never touch him when he is out of season, for he has no power of compelling my mood, a power which I regard as the sure sign of excellent literature, that of creating receptiveness, of tuning heart and brain to its own key.

But given the right moment, and such a book as "Representative Men" has a fine flavour. I care nothing then that there is so much "representative" and so little "men." Nor does it trouble me that the representing is awkwardly managed, here a little loose, and there rather forced, and at times a tendency to turn men into bags of proverbs. This dissolving of people into uses, qualities, and attributes is vicious as a perpetual habit of mind, and often leads Emerson into talk that is cheap, slushy, and even downright inhuman, but here in these seven little lectures no harm is done; there is some playing fast and loose with sacred names, but they are warranted not to tarnish easily, and as (praise the Gods!) it was too late for Emerson to reform Shakespeare, I can read on and be thankful; and after all, in this wilful jumble of sentences and perpetual concussion of contradiction, what an amount of that wonderful light, which is all Emerson's own, there is. Here are six men of noble proportions in the genial sunshine of his imagination. Hero worship was the fashion, and I cannot but think of its veteran priest. Carlyle has the advantage in flesh and blood; he gives us hands to hold and feet to follow. Emerson has nothing of his Rembrandt power of portraiture; how great, and yet how near to us is dear old Johnson in the "Hero as Man of Letters." But Emerson is a corrective, for Carlyle's figures are too much in shadow, they are all Laocoons and Men of Sorrows. I doubt whether Mercury himself was so glib with the messages of Jupiter as is Emerson's herald of the high gods; but then, on the other hand, Carlyle wanted to pick a quarrel with the herald unless he positively stammered. Alone no two writers could be more utterly incomplete—the one so volatile and devil-may-care, the other for ever at the point of resistance—but the blending of the two becomes interesting chemistry.

The "Representative Men" begins with Plato, who stands for the philosophical class. But it opens in right regal fashion: all the books are converted into translations of Plato, and not only the philosophers, but the poets, the learned doctors of science and theology and grave divines, and even the jokers, are reduced to a rabble of needy mendicants at his heels. Shakespeare just escapes by the skin of his teeth. After a very airy excursion, and a pilgrimage to the East, we are led back to the central figure of Plato's system, Socrates, who is described in a style that might make Macaulay envious. The insight of genius, the talent of the master artist for selection, have given us a fragment of biography only comparable with Greek statuary. Every salient feature is caught, and caught picturesquely. Here is a paragraph:—

> A pitiless disputant who knows nothing, but the bounds of whose conquering intelligence no man had ever reached; whose temper was imperturbable, whose dreadful logic was always leisurely and sportive; so careless and ignorant as to disarm the wariest, and draw them, in the pleasantest manner, into horrible doubts and confusion. But he always knew the way out; knew it, yet would not tell it. No escape; he drives them to terrible choices by his dilemmas, and tosses the Hippiases and Gorgiases with their grand reputations, as a boy tosses his balls. The tyrannous realist! Meno has discoursed a thousand times at length on virtue, before many companions, and very well, as it appeared to him; but at this moment he cannot even tell what it is.

From Plato the philosopher we pass to Swedenborg the mystic. Emerson ought to be at home with Swedenborg, for Swedenborg is certainly the great doctor of the "representative" school. Personally, I think that an excessive symbolism is the destruction of good art and direct thinking. Shakespeare, Dante, Leonardo da Vinci, Jean Francois Millet do not give us types but individuals. By first of all accepting the reality of men and things they open out their significance. Emerson, however, begins by praising Swedenborg for his hard literal precision in this matter, and laughing at the poets for being vague. I prefer the poets, for where it is an opinion as to what a thing may mean, what may be agreeable as an illustration becomes disagreeable forced into an analogy. Emerson himself prefers vagueness and the poets generally; he thinks Wordsworth's "Ode" the best thing on immortality, a perfect example of legitimate symbolism, and its whole philosophy at the same time, and diametrically opposed to that of Swedenborg, where the definition, ever tending to become more arbitrary, ends at last by conveying no meaning except to himself and a group of disciples who have inherited his spectacles. So we are not surprised to find Emerson in the end blaming his mystic for the very quality he has hitherto been praising, and accusing him of turning the whole passionate lives of men into a scroll of queer hieroglyphics. "How different is Jacob Behmen!" he exclaims; "his heart beats so high that the thumping against his leathern coat is audible across the centuries." But he rates Swedenborg in such admirable words, discovers his weakness with such humour, and enforces with such rare discernment the wisdom of reticence in spiritual matters, that one easily forgives the whole passage being a contradiction, so noble is the attitude, so dignified and so benign.

I would that now I might write Emerson down as a lover of our Saint Michael of Montaigne. Bacon, Shakespeare, Isaac Walton, Sterne, Hazlitt, all speaking our mother tongue, have read and loved his book. Emerson read it in Cotton's translation, which cannot be compared with Florio's, and yet he detected the life that is in this man's words; he cribbed them, too. From Montaigne's discourse (divine I should call it, but it is the most beautifully human bit of writing in the world) on "Friendship" he took some phrases to lie cold and shivering in his own arid waste of words on the same subject; but at last he left Montaigne a doubter, a go-between, without enthusiasms, and never saw that the quality of his scepticism is more imaginative than rational; that imagination, ranging from the merest whim to the most hazardous height of speculation, abounds everywhere. This third study, Montaigne on the Skeptic, I find very disappointing. The frank, homely, conservative side of the man is delightfully treated, and the scepticism on its negative side insisted on; but the daring curiosity, the doubt, picturesque as the propositions of children, rising rather from excess than limitation of vision—this side, which surely must have been the attraction for a nature like Emerson's, is quite ignored, and this is the finer side of scepticism and has made the French the first sceptics.

But it is good to see the somewhat cold and impersonal Emerson learning to be a little more personal from Montaigne. A man who doubts the personality of God may be a heretic, but he who doubts the personality of man is something much worse. In the next lecture we are not put off with anything representative. Shakespeare is made light of as a poet, and a large and touching humanity is brought to us. Ask his characters, and they shall speak for the heart, the liver, and lungs of their royal master. What matters the blank in the history books? Shakespeare's history is in these plays. Emerson will not be bounced into Baconianism; he sees with exquisite judgment that with Shakespeare it is not a question of a superlative talent or so. Plato may be as fine, but he is easier to account for, and so he accepts Shakespeare as unique, and does him honour in many a splendid sentence. "He is wise without emphasis or assertion; he is strong as nature is strong, who lifts the land into mountain slopes without effort, and by the same rule as she floats a bubble in the air, and likes as well to do the one as the other." And this impartiality as it is the wonder of Shakespeare so is it his supreme humanness. He is lacking in symmetry; he is superabundant; he does worse things than nod in verse; but in characterisation he never errs; his people are great and small on lines of real life, not according to the number of their speeches—with him we are in Brobdingnag; with other authors it is Liliput and just a giant or two.

But Emerson does not like unique people, and now the stature of Shakespeare alarms his democratic soul; it must be reduced, and this is done by an appeal to the Nonconformist conscience. I wish it was only funny to find the man with a fine taste in "Scourges of God" and impenitent Sadis, concluding his lecture in the style of Chadband with a pious snuffle about public amusement.

Hitherto the lectures have been dealing with thinkers; the fifth study gives us a man of action, under the heading, "Napoleon, or the Man of the World." As long as there is any old Adam left in us we shall find Napoleon's life an absorbing one. Cæsar's has more weight, and Alexander's more glamour, but Napoleon's yields more copy; it abounds with those tit-bits so dear to modern journalism. Out of scraps and fragments Emerson has constructed a most effective figure; the representative theory is luminous here. As an American, Emerson was captivated by a man whose thoughts, unlike most men's thoughts, were born with strong hands and feet for immediate uses. Napoleon is the sublime opportunist; the evolution of the tool-using animal ends here in perfection; the aims of the democracy are consummated.

Perhaps the pro and con principle which pervades these lectures might have been a little more evenly distributed in this one. The fall of Napoleon is too big a lesson for one page. Eminently sane was this man, says Emerson, and yet to follow his career throughout is at last to watch a feverish monomaniac following the sinister devil of his own shadow, and to see him die of boredom at the end is to get a queer glimpse of how the Fates do their business. But Emerson's generalisation is quite to the point; this man had no sentiment or morals, and the world is made by other forces besides punctuality and tools.

Men who give courses of lectures do not usually keep the best wine to the end. I think Emerson has. An apostle of light, he has honoured the greatest apostle of light, Goethe, who stands in the last study for the writer. "Not the most solemn, nor the most passionate, nor the most earnest, but the most serious," says Seeley of Goethe. This is the dictum of a student of Goethe, but Emerson has anticipated him, and in one radiant paragraph has shown how Culture may be a Gospel. In the older or the new learning have we a finer word for the true scholar? "In England or America, one may be an adept in the writing of a Greek or Latin poet without any poetic taste or fire. That a man has spent years on Plato, does not afford a presumption that he holds heroic opinions, or undervalues the fashions of his town. But the German nation have the most ridiculous good faith on these subjects; the student out of the lecture-room still broods on the lessons, and the professor cannot divest himself of the fancy that the truths of philosophy have some application to Munich and Berlin. This earnestness enables them to outsee men of much more talent."

R. H. U. BLOOR.

EMERSON IN ENGLAND.

OF Emerson's three visits to England, he has himself left a record of the first two, in 1833 and in 1847-8, in his "English Traits." The third visit was in 1872-3, with his daughter Ellen, when the evening was already closing in upon him, and, while he was seeking to recruit his health, friends at Concord were rebuilding his house, which had been burnt. Of all three visits there is a full record in "Cabot's Life," with delightful passages from Emerson's letters home. In Mr. Conway's "Emerson At Home and Abroad" there is a chapter of special interest on this subject, and the late Alexander Ireland, in his memorial volume, was able to give many particulars from his own personal recollections.

It is of Mr. Ireland that Emerson speaks towards the end of his "English Traits," telling of his arrival on his second visit, in 1847 :—

At the landing in Liverpool I found my Manchester correspondent awaiting me, a gentleman whose kind reception was followed by a train of friendly and effective attentions which never rested whilst I remained in the country. A man of sense and of letters, the editor of a powerful local journal, he added to solid virtues an infinite sweetness and bonhomie.

Mr. Ireland had played a chief part in persuading Emerson to this second visit, making the arrangements for his lectures in various places, chiefly in the north of England; and this was not their first meeting, for as a young man in Edinburgh, in 1833, a fortunate chance had given him the opportunity of showing Emerson something of his native city, thus laying the foundation of a life-long admiration and affection. In those early days Mr. Ireland heard Emerson preach, and tells of it in this passage of his "Recollections" :—

On Sunday, the 18th of August, 1833, I heard him deliver a discourse in the Unitarian Chapel, Young-street, Edinburgh, and I remember distinctly the effect which it produced on his hearers. It is almost needless to say that nothing like it had ever been heard before, and many of them did not know what to make of it. The originality of his thoughts, the consummate beauty of the language in which they were clothed, the calm dignity of his bearing, the absence of all oratorical effect, and the singular directness and simplicity of his manner, free from the least shadow of dogmatic assumption, made a deep impression on me. Not long before this I had listened to a wonderful sermon by Dr. Chalmers, whose force and energy and vehement but rather tumid eloquence carried, for the moment, all before them—his audience becoming like clay in the hands of the potter. But I must confess that the frequent thoughts and severe self-possession of the young Boston minister had a greater charm for me than all the rhetorical splendours of Chalmers. His voice was the sweetest, the most winning and penetrating of any I ever heard.

Emerson's lectures on "Representative Men" were given both in Liverpool and Manchester in the autumn of 1847, and in Manchester he gave a further course, including the lectures on "Eloquence," "Domestic Life," "Reading," "The Superlative in Manners and Literature," and "The Humanity of Science."

Of the young men who were kindled by these lectures, we are happy to count some among our veterans to-day. Mr. Harry Rawson heard the second course in Manchester, and in THE INQUIRER of Sept. 28, 1901, we told how Mr. Thomas Hornblower Gill came over from Birmingham to see Emerson in Manchester. (For that occasion see Mr. Conway's book, p. 268.) Mr. Edwin Clephan heard the lecture at Leicester for which the audience had to wait in anxious suspense while it was fetched from a house more than a mile away, Emerson having discovered, only after he took his place on the platform, that he had left it at home!

Among the Liverpool hearers was James Martineau, who had already made Emerson's acquaintance in 1833, when he came with an introduction from Henry Ware. Writing home from Chelsea, Oct. 27, 1847, Emerson says :—

In Liverpool I drank tea last Saturday night with James Martineau, and heard him preach on Sunday night last. He is a sincere, sensible, good man, and though greatly valued as a preacher, yet I thought him superior to his books and his preaching.

That impression would appear to have been mutual, for it is interesting to compare with these words what Dr. Martineau said of Emerson. Writing to the late Mr. R. C. Hall, at whose house in Liverpool Emerson spent his last evening in this country in 1873, Dr. Martineau said :—

A most winning and delightful personality on the side of the affections and conscience, he somewhat disappoints me intellectually. With deep and lovely flashes of insight, characteristic of real genius, I find mixed many dicta which, though striking in their epigrammatic form, do not speak to me as true . . . . Much as I love the man, I seek in vain to learn from him. The fault is probably in me.

And in an earlier letter, to Mr. Ireland, Dec. 31, 1882, Dr. Martineau wrote :—

Though I could never find in Emerson's effusions as a Vates so rich a vein of thought or so awakening a power as his most devoted readers are able to recognise, yet in his own personality he appeared to me almost all that is noble, lovely and venerable; and in his critical and ethical writings, where he commented on the given matter of life, manners and character, to rise to the very perfection of moral judgment, pure and keen without a trace of Cynicism, and with a selecting enthusiasm for all beauty and good, calm and passionless because full of faith in them as the permanency of the world.

We should have been glad to extend these notes, to tell of Emerson's meeting with George Eliot, and many other matters of great personal interest, but must be content to add only one exquisite passage from one of his home letters, quoted in Cabot's Life (I. p. 124). Emerson is writing to his wife from Manchester, Dec. 1, 1847 :—

I trust you and the children are well,—that you are well, and the children are well,—two facts, and not one; two facts highly important to an exile, you will believe. Ah! perhaps you shoulds ee the tragic spectacles which these streets show—these Manchester and those Liverpool streets, by day and by night—to know how much of happiest circumstance, how much of safety, of dignity, and of opportunity belongs to us so easily that is ravished from this population. Woman is cheap and vile in England, it is tragical to see; childhood, too, I see oftenest in the state of absolute beggary. My dearest little Edie, to tell you the truth, costs me many a penny, day by day. I cannot go up the street but I shall see some woman in rags, with a little creature just of Edie's size and age, but in coarsest ragged clothes and barefooted, stepping beside her; and I look anxiously into her Edie's face with some terror lest it should resemble mine, and the far-off Edie wins from me the halfpence for this near one. Bid Ellen and Edie thank God they were born in New England, and bid them speak the truth and do the right for ever and ever, and I hope they and theirs will not stand barefooted in the mud on a bridge in the rain all day to beg of passengers. But beggary is only the beginning and the sign of sorrow and evil here.

GOOD Friend, whose voice hath spurred and cheered
My flagging spirit on its way;
When, like a wilderness, appeared
My life to stretch a boundless grey
And barren landscape to the day;

When weakness raised its bitter cry
Far from the succouring hand of kin,
And sank in baffled agony
Beneath the weight of others' sin,
Thy whisper reached it, "Look within!"

How oft the rocks beneath thy rod,
Their streams of quickening hope have shed,
Where fainting hearts drank deep and trod,
With strength renewed, where Duty led;
And Faith restored gleaned heavenly bread!

Good Friend! if few have paused to bless
For help received the helping hand;
Accept as theirs than mine no less
A stranger's tribute scratched in sand
Upon a dry and thirsty land!

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—At the Liverpool meeting of the Triennial Conference, its esteemed President called attention to the fact that three years ago it had acquired a definite constitution, and he showed that the present aims and objects of the society were much more far-reaching than those of the simple Conference, to which, twenty-one years ago, our liberal churches were invited for the purposes of mutual interchange of thought and edification.

Now, this being the case, I trust it will not be considered unfit if I urge that the present Committee should take as their first business, and as a matter of urgency, the drawing up of a plain statement of what are the aims and objects of this newly developed constitution. Further, that they should arrange that a copy of this statement be sent, without delay, to every church in the list of the Essex Hall Year Book, together with a paper to be signed and returned by each congregation that desires to join this reconstituted society, for which, perhaps, having regard to its changed condition, it might be well to find a more suitable name than that of the Conference. I may be reminded that some such paper was sent round more than a twelvemonth ago, but it must be remembered that before that could be acted upon, another letter arrived asking the congregations to let the matter stand over for a time.

Surely before entering into the question of ways and means it will be well to know definitely how many of our churches desire to join such an organisation as that shadowed forth by some of the speakers at Liverpool. I can quite understand that some may wish to organise themselves into one compact whole, in full obedience to a House of Representatives so far as externals go, and even perhaps to the consenting of all to sing from one authorised hymn-book with fixed tunes. To such churches we may well wish Godspeed in their new departure, for they are thus taking the path which they honestly believe to be the best; but at the same time those of us who do not think that our best lies in that direction, may fairly claim the same right to stand aloof as others do to join together. There are diversities of operations, but may we not all recognise the workings of the one Spirit?

And this brings me to the second point. In the concluding paragraph of his letter last week, Mr. Lummis first assumes a certain definition of the name Unitarian—a definition which seems to me to be utterly erroneous—and upon that he proceeds to base a charge against our Central Association. Now, most of us, I think, who were "born free," take the primary signification of the name (which, for the sake of convenience, has come to be attached to us) to apply to those who put in the first place not only the right of private judgment, but the sacred duty of cultivating and using their own best powers of heart and mind and soul and strength, in matters of religion, and in acknowledging the inner voice as supreme tribunal in contradistinction to that of an external Authority. Doctrine, so far from being the foundation of Unitarianism, has ever held a subordinate position, and has always had to give way when conscience or intellect pronounced against it. It was because men took to reading the Bible for themselves that the doctrine of the Trinity—not being, in their judgment, proved therein—was given up, and it was in commemoration (we may almost say) of the passing of this important landmark that the name of Unitarian was applied. But the same thing has been repeated over and over again throughout the whole history of this little group of pilgrims, who are making their way towards the heavenly city along this road; landmark after landmark of doctrine has been passed and left behind. Those of us who can look back to the past forty years can well remember how one or two doctrines, viewed then as vital, have now been relegated to the past, and yet it has made no change in our real standpoint; indeed, it only seems to have brought out in higher relief and brighter light our watchwords Love to God and Love to man.

If what I have said is true concerning the root principle of Unitarianism, and it is in this sense alone that many of us, at least, accept the name, it stands to reason that there is nothing illogical or out of place in an association made up of individuals united under that name, helping, through its Committee, any body of people who appear to be making their way to the kingdom of God and His righteousness by the same path as that which they accept as the best, whether it be to the Brahmo Somaj in India, or to a Unitarian church in England.

But divided responsibility in a small body is not always advisable, and until our existing Association finds that it cannot compass the work which its members have given it to do, I own that it seems to me an action greatly to be deplored, if forces are to be divided in the way suggested by some members of the Conference Committee; and it is assuredly of the utmost importance that at least our churches may have the opportunity of a frank expression of opinion before anything further is done.

MINISTERS' MEETING.

SIR,—Will you kindly assist in making known the Ministers' Meeting to be held in connection with the Whit-week anniversary meetings? Dr. Crooker is to read a paper on public worship in the council-room at 3.30. In the name of the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting, I beg to extend a cordial invitation to all visiting brethren to be present. Tea will be provided. W. CHYNOWETH POPE,

DOES THE CONFERENCE REPRESENT THE CHURCHES?

SIR,—There can be no doubt that, formally, the Conference does represent the churches, for the churches elect the delegates. But, in order that this representation may be valid, significant and effective, several conditions must be present which I venture to submit are wanting in the present case.

The questions to be debated at any Triennial Conference being known beforehand, the representative, to be truly such, must ascertain and express by his votes the wishes of the majority of his constituents. The questions at issue should be discussed by the congregations, and their minds having been formed in regard to each, they must choose for delegates those whom they can trust to represent their decisions. It is in this way that all representatives are chosen for Parliament and other public bodies. Each member goes to the Assembly as the supporter of the party and policy which his constituency on the whole desires to be supported.

I would respectfully ask to what extent do these conditions prevail in regard to the delegates chosen by the congregations for the Triennial Conference?

I have taken some pains to inquire, but I have found no single case of a delegate avowedly chosen by his congregation that he might either support or resist any particular policy before the Conference. His representative character is little more than an empty form. He is chosen not in a spirit of keen interest in the questions before the Conference, but often in complete ignorance of what the questions are. In short, he is so far from being a true representative that even if all the delegates were to give a unanimous vote for or against any questions before the Conference, it would be impossible to infer from this the mind of the churches in regard to that question. Things being as they are, the votes of the delegates are no criterion of the trend of public opinion behind them. Often, alas, there is no public opinion at all.

The mode in which delegates are chosen for the Conference will be familiar to many readers of this paper. Last on the agenda of the Church Committee meeting stands the item "Election of Delegates to the Conference." As the members present are putting on their hats, the chairman hurriedly calls out that one little matter of business still remains—the election of somebody to go to the Conference. The members present look at one another with an interrogative expression, and draw nearer the door. "Who would like to go?" says the chairman. No answer. "Who can go?" At last a victim offers himself, and with a benediction from the chair, "Hope you will have a pleasant time," the matter comes to an end.

We have all heard much about the representative character of the Conference. We know that great hopes and important schemes are based upon the view that it does represent the churches. But may I ask whether the delegates consciously attend in a representative attitude? Are they aware of a distinct public opinion behind them, which will call them to account for their votes? Do they feel themselves the organ of anything beyond their own private judgment? In short, may we take it for granted that the acts of the Conference express the mind of the churches and not merely the decision of that particular group of people who are present at the meetings where action is taken.?

Until I can get clearer light upon these matters, I must remain—but regretfully remain—one of those to whom the idea of the Conference, as representative of the churches, is little more than a myth.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL.

SIR,—May I ask the privilege of a small space in your paper on this subject. Most of your readers will know that Miss Matilda Sharpe, with the assistance of the late Mr. Spears, started this school some seventeen years ago as a Unitarian Boarding School for girls on modern high-school lines. It may not be known to all of them that three years ago she made it over to a trust, still retaining the management in her hands, but with a view of asking the trustees at some future date to take the full responsibility of the school.

The time has now come when Miss Sharpe finds it necessary to relinquish the management, and from the close of the present term the school will be in the hands of a management committee, appointed by the trustees, and whose names I hope very shortly to be able to announce.

The head mistress, Miss Lilian Talbot, B.A., will have the full charge of the school with a thoroughly competent and well-qualified staff under this Committee, and it will be the aim of the managers to give at a very moderate cost a thoroughly good high-school education with the happy healthy tone which has long characterised Channing House.

Our only anxiety is that the school should become more widely known among many of our Unitarian families, who, we hope, will gladly avail themselves of the opportunity, and send their daughters where the teaching is definitely in accordance with the principles of our faith, while the education is of the highest character.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

W. ARTHUR SHARPE.

Hon. Sec. to the Trustees.

RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL WORK IN VILLAGES.

SIR,—May I draw the attention of your readers to the Conference on "Religious and Social Work in Villages," which is to take place in Whit-week in connection with the Annual Meeting of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union. Miss Sewell, of the Southwark Women's University Settlement (though not of our household of faith), has most kindly undertaken to open the discussion and to give us the benefit of her wide experience of social and educational work both in town and country. Those who will be in London during Whit-week should not lose the opportunity of hearing her, and of conferring with her on this important question.

The grave problems which come before our Society in connection with the Suffolk Village Mission—how to remedy the tumble-down cottages, the bad water, the absence of recreative and educational stimulus, the insufficient means of saving, the low wages, the low morals, the low ideals—these are equally pressing for solution in every part of rural England. If our religion is to be a reality, and not lose itself in empty words, it must learn to grapple with the evils of the day, in the spirit of Christ. FLORENCE HILL.

Hon. Sec. Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union.

THE DANGER OF TYRANNY.

SIR,—In speaking of the Unitarian Association as having already grasped the reins of Church government, I was alluding (not, I think, in too strong a phrase) to facts which are notorious and unquestioned. The Association has become the collector of dues and the paymaster to the Free Churches. Certain ecclesiastical funds have been placed under its control. The hand-book of the Free Churches is published by the Unitarian Association, and compiled by its secretary, who is, moreover, the general adviser of the Churches, the man upon whose knowledge and wisdom they call in their difficulties.

Where the power of the paymaster, the custody of the official lists and the actual direction of Church affairs are combined, these—may we not say?—are the hands which hold the reins of Church government.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

GREY DAYS.

I WONDER how many of you children have learnt about the Gulf Stream, that wonderful warm current of water which makes such a difference to so many countries? One part of it comes up past the British Isles, and brings us the warmth we should not otherwise get; but suppose you read about it and find a map of it for yourselves, then you will know all about it.

One day lately we were talking about this warm current, and I heard that someone once said, if anything caused the Gulf Stream to stop flowing past these shores, the British Isles would be cold and wrapped in mist for many days at a time.

As I heard these words it came over me how very dependent we are on outside things like the weather for the warmth, sunshine and clearness of our lives; and how, if we had grey days one after another very often, the result would be one of two things: either everyone would get very gloomy, dull and unhappy, or we would all try our very best to be bright and sunshiny ourselves in order to counteract the cold grey mist which enveloped us.

And then I thought that it would be so much better to start now, while we have so many bright days to help us—for the sun is a help—so that, if ever the dark, dull days come, we shall, by the "practice" which "makes perfect," be better fitted to bear them and help others to do the same. For even in England, with the Gulf Stream flowing past, and with all our bright days, there is so much sadness and there are so many grey days in people's lives, that we cannot carry too much sunshine with us.

Perhaps some of you have noticed how you like being with one person more than another, and you feel better yourself after being with some people, perhaps without knowing why. Sometimes it may be a grown-up person, but very often only one of your playfellows. I think it usually arises from the current in their hearts acting on you in the same way that the Gulf Stream affects these isles.

It is always so sad when anyone goes off into a corner and "won't play," for they not only spoil the time for themselves but for all the others. Even if the others go on for their game they can feel the grey mist away there in the corner, and they cannot play with quite so much happiness as if all had joined in.

I know a little girl, who, when her grey days came—as they come to all, I think, at different times—used, when very little, to bang her own head on the floor or put herself in the corner. Do some of you say "How silly! I wouldn't hurt myself"? Ah! but you do very often, though, perhaps, in a different way; the way it hurts you, your very self, may do more lasting injury than a bump on the head, which is well in a day or two.

When that little girl grew older her grey days showed in the play with her sisters, and she was fretful and quarrelsome. But there was a stream of loving warmth always flowing by her, which helped to clear away the grey mists of her life; she was given something to do to help others, and gradually the sweet expression would return to her dear little face, and she would be a ray of sunshine.

Oh! the happiness those people bring, young or old, who enter a room "like a ray of sunshine." We cannot try too hard so to live that each will supply a ray of that sunshine which, when all is blended together, will flood the world with one beautiful light, and so transform it that we shall find we have risen above the grey mists and have entered into a clearer and purer atmosphere.

People never seem satisfied with the weather. It is either too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry, or too windy; and, alas! how often do we not put down all the crossnesses which arise in ourselves to—the weather.

It may not hurt the weather, but I am quite sure it harms us, because by blaming the weather we slide the responsibility off our shoulders where it rightly belongs.

"Whatever the weather may be," says he,
"Whatever the weather may be,
It's the songs ye sing an' the smiles ye wear
That's makin' the sunshine everywhere;
An' the world of gloom is a world of glee,
Wid the bird in the bush, an' the bird in the tree,
Whatever the weather may be," says he,
"Whatever the weather may be."

RELIGION THAT HELPS.

ONCE more on the eve of Whitsuntide the annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission makes its direct and searching appeal to the members of our religious community. That appeal is directed specifically to the young men and women of culture, and with some command of leisure, within reach of the East of London and of Marylebone, asking them whether they care to help, whether they believe in the power of goodness and of brotherly kindness to win its way amid dreary and sometimes appalling surroundings, and lift something of the shadow of life, whether they will come down and give something of their many gifts, in friendly sympathy, something of themselves, to those whose need is so much greater than their own. Let them read the report of the meeting and the reports of the Missionaries and see whether the appeal does not come home to them.

But the Mission does not simply make this one direct appeal to those who are close at hand and are called to take a share in the work. It has a word for all who believe in the gospel of practical helpfulness, and desire to have the power of a liberal faith manifested in the world. We are told again and again that the Unitarian conception of life is ineffective, that it has no power to uplift and help men in their sorest need. In the April number of the British Friend MARY A. WALLIS wrote a warm appreciation of Dr. MARTINEAU, but with this reservation, that his interpretation of Christianity was insufficient as a faith to live by, that he robbed the conception of JESUS of "its essential spiritual contents and its dynamic power," and "robs the mystery of the Cross of its deepest significance, and throws away the lever which, more than any other, has shown itself potent to raise our fallen humanity." Professor W. T. DAVISON says substantially the same in the April number of the London Quarterly in an article on "Martineau and Modern Unitarianism," and we quoted a fortnight ago Mr. CHARLES BOOTH'S judgment that the Unitarian view of the spiritual world wakes "little response in the human soul." We do not argue the matter here and at this moment, but we say that in the work of our Missions is the test. Here if ever it must be seen that our faith in Eternal Goodness has dynamic power, that in our conception of the Kingdom of God on earth there is inspiration, and that when we speak of human brotherhood it is not merely a form of words. It is not true that men of our faith effect no conversions, and rescue no brother from destruction. But are we all doing what we ought? Does the passion of self-sacrifice and of brotherly love move us as it ought, and bring every available helper into the field? We ask again that the reports may be read, and append here the conclusion of the Committee's report :—

"Once more would the Committee, in conclusion, warmly commend the three Missions to the generous help of those who desire to see the simple principles of a spiritual religion applied to the difficult problem of morally and socially raising the condition of the poorer classes in our huge metropolis. Mr. Charles Booth, in his recent work on 'Religious Influences in London,' speaks of the members of our Liberal Churches as 'quite invaluable leaders in social work.' 'In the institution of "Domestic Missions," he says, 'they were pioneers.' Their activity in the field, he points out, 'dates from even an earlier period than the foundation of the Ragged School Union, and of that the scope was at first much more limited.' Great experiments have since been made by orthodox bodies, but, he adds, there are none of those engaged in such attempts that might not with advantage study the work done and the experience gained by our unsectarian organisations. It is the belief of your Committee that so far from the establishment of other agencies having curtailed the sphere of usefulness opened to the Missions of this Society, it does but throw upon them a heavier responsibility of continuing and extending the work to which they were the first to show the way. They combine features not often to be met with in conjunction elsewhere; on the one hand, the insistence upon individual character and moral integrity as the absolutely necessary condition of all effective social reform; on the other hand, the recognition of the deep influence exerted by educational and spiritual agencies upon the life and conduct of the individual. Slowly and by degrees, it is to be hoped, the material environment of the manual toilers in our great cities will be altered and improved by wise action on the part of our legislators. Meanwhile, it is the function of Missions such as ours to do what in them lies towards fitting the people themselves for the impending change, and enabling them to reap its fruits when it comes. Daily your Missionaries are giving their whole time and strength to the task they have undertaken, and the Committee trust that their self-sacrificing labours will meet with the approval and sympathy of those whose representatives they are at their several posts of duty."

THE LONDON EDUCATION BILL.

THE proposed sub-division of London's educational machinery has been given up, and all who know anything about the matter must be devoutly glad. The Government's Bill is a mischievous one still; it abolishes without cause a School Board whose praises have been eloquently uttered this week by Sir JOHN GORST—no partisan in this, if in any case; it adds an enormous task to a County Council which is already heavily burdened; and it extends to the metropolitan area the pernicious principle, already in force in the provinces, that institutions paid for wholly by public money shall be exempt from full public control. In respect to these points it calls for continued vigorous opposition, especially as to the second and third. The County Council's deliberate and overwhelming vote is against the imposition upon it of these new duties. The question of the denominational schools has received new significance after the great demonstration last Saturday in Hyde Park. Politicians who may care little by what name the effective educational authority is to be called cannot ignore the serious factors of an unwilling administration and of an indignant electorate. Would that the Government could even at this late hour find room for a full repentance!

Meanwhile, as we have said, we must be glad at so much repentance as has been shown this week. Clause 2 of the Bill, which went through several chameleon colours in process of dying, is now absolutely dead. The London County Council, as the new local education authority, is left to formulate the scheme of its working committee just as any other Council in the country. It was a great triumph of common sense when the promoters of the Bill saw the inevitable and decided to drop that clause. It was, we suppose, only in human nature that after making so many solemn protestations in behalf of the Borough Councils, the PRIME MINISTER and Sir WILLIAM ANSON should resolve to retain them "in the Bill" as far as possible. Clause 3 as originally drafted had devised amazing powers for them; they were to appoint and dismiss teachers, settle their salaries, hold the buildings, manage the whole work of the schools, and decide upon new sites. On the first announcement of this extraordinary proposal, which involved the most deplorable disorder and waste, the chorus of protest was loud; it was continuous and widespread; and it reached its culmination this week in the speeches of members on both sides of the House, who showed to conviction the absurdity of any such scheme. Sir JOHN GORST brought the terrible weight of his knowledge and experience fully to bear on the hapless Sir WILLIAM, who in the end had to accept, in place of this Clause, amendments which, while far from perfect, render the Bill immeasurably more satisfactory.

The hope is that on the Report stage further amendment may be effected. At present the Borough Councils are given the power to appoint three-fourths of the local managers to one-fourth appointed by the County Council, and apparently the "local education authority" is to be absolutely supreme over the managers just as the School Board is. If that is so, the worst evils are averted. The only substantial privilege assigned to the Borough Councils is with respect to sites, in the determination of which within their respective boroughs they are to be consulted. A notable improvement in the Bill is the provision that "due regard shall be had to the inclusion of women" among the local managers.

Sir WILLIAM ANSON, like Mr. BALFOUR, has repeatedly expressed the wish to stimulate local popular interest in the education of the children, and we suppose that a genuine desire of the kind blended in the considerations which led to the original drafting of this singularly ill-fated Bill. Certainly there is much room for improvement in regard to the attitude of Londoners generally on this subject, and everyone will wish a means could be found to this end. Whether one-member constituencies of an "ad hoc" body would have been a remedy for the prevailing apathy is at least worth considering, and, at any rate, it would escape the blunders of the precious scheme offered by this Government of blunderers. London just escaped a disaster, but it will not forget those ill-informed legislators who in their child-like innocence planned it for them.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE sixty-eighth annual meeting of this society was held on Wednesday evening at the Bell-street Mission, Edgware-road, the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of the King's Weigh House Congregational Church, in the chair. The opportunity was taken to offer a cordial welcome to the Rev. Sydney H. Street, the newly-appointed missionary at Bell-street, in succession to the Rev. B. Kirkman Grey.

The meeting opened with a hymn and prayer offered by the Chairman, after which Mr. Philip Roscoe made his annual statement as treasurer.

The accounts showed a balance of £211 2s. 1d. at the beginning of the year, reduced to £46 13s. 6d.; but four legacies, amounting to £365, had enabled the Committee again to purchase consols to the value of £433 18s. 1d., and a legacy of £200 since received from Mrs. E. B. Squire was also to be so invested. The increase in annual subscriptions was £142 (though £58 had been lost, chiefly through the death of old subscribers), and the congregational collections were £10 less than last year. The treasurer appealed for £200 more in annual subscriptions, and said that his own feeling was that they wanted a building fund, for they certainly ought to have more adequate buildings at Rhyl-street.

The Rev. G. DAWES HICKS, hon. sec., read the Committee's report.

The report opened with an expression of high appreciation of the labours of the missionaries, and an appeal for more helpers, the large Sunday-school at Rhyl-street in particular being crippled for lack of teachers for several of the classes. The Rev. B. Kirkman Gray's enforced retirement for reasons of health from the work at Bell-street was recorded with deep regret, and a warm tribute paid to the devoted work both he and Mrs. Gray had given to the Mission. Acknowledgment was also made of the zeal and courage with which the Rev. E. E. Jenkins had taken up the work during Mr. Gray's absence. The Rev. S. H. Street had in January accepted the invitation to succeed Mr. Gray, and the best wishes were offered to him and to Mrs. Street in entering upon the work. Meanwhile the work at George's-row and Rhyl-street had been vigorously carried on. The financial position, as above noted was explained. The conclusion of the report is quoted in another column.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, spoke as follows :—

The late Professor Henry Drummond, during the last years of his life, published a little tract that had a large circulation, entitled, "A City without a Church." He was not, I venture to think, quite wise and right in the implied depreciation of the value of institutional religion which runs through that brilliant exposition of the truly Christian lesson of the divineness of common life and common work. To argue that because all life and work ought to be sacred to our feeling and thought there is no need for churches, is to oppose things which are not only perfectly consistent but absolutely necessary to each other. Willingly and gladly let the idea of worship be enlarged to mean the sum of the highest energy and consecration of human life, but this enlargement takes for granted the inclusion and use of the means by which the consecration is induced—the quickening and nourishing in the soul of the sentiments and affections which are needed to inspire and hallow the life. But the day of "the city without a church" is not yet, if it will ever be. As men and communities of men rise morally and religiously, they will not lose any of the noblest necessities and characteristics of their present life, though these will all be carried nearer perfection, and find truer and finer embodiment and expression. The Church in some form will have as commanding and permanent a place in the city of the future as religion will in the life of the individual.

The twentieth century is dawning upon peoples who are destined for the great majority to live in cities. And in the cities all the forces of good and evil are present in their keenest and intensest forms. The grave problems which confront modern civilisation press hardest and will continue to press hardest in our great cities. Our religion began in cities, and in cities will still be found the chief sources of its strength and its largest opportunities. The Apostles sought first of all to win to the Christian obedience the great centres of life and influence, Jerusalem, Antioch, Phillipi, Athens, Corinth and Rome, believing that if the cities were won the rural communities would follow as a matter of course. The Church, when it is what it ought to be, is wanted more in the city than anywhere else. The problem of civilisation is still to—

> Work in the man, work out the beast,
> And make the ape and tiger die.

And without that strong compulsion of high influences in the way of reverence and the Christian humanities, men will quickly follow where crude force, unscrupulous sharpness, and ignoble passions are leading on to another deluge of barbaric power. Because religion is just another name for the ideal spirit and order of all true life, personal and collective, there can be no separation between Church and city or Church and State other than that which is formal and functional. Few now-a-days will venture to deny that Christian Churches and Christian ministers have a direct mission to the city and nation. The most conservative among us are no longer inclined to use the declaration of Jesus that his kingdom is not any such coarse compulsion as the Caesars wielded to justify separation from the movements of civilisation. The kingdom and Church of Christ are not of the world, but they are in the world, and in it not to condemn it but to save it. We have as yet no Christian civilisation, if by Christian civilisation we mean a civilisation based upon the principles and spirit of Jesus Christ. We have not yet seen a Christian state or a Christian city, but unquestionably the ultimate purpose and aim of our religion is a Christian civilisation. So far as organisation and government are concerned, we may believe, with many of our fathers, that for the Church to serve city and nation well it must be independent of the State, and yet at the same time believe in the civic and national mission of the Church, and seek and strive through our Churches to serve city and nation. The existence of society in any noble sense depends upon the reverence and faith, the justice, love and sympathy which the Churches exist to quicken and foster. These are the ideal forces which are the strength and safeguard of our civilisation. And religion, where it is not dead or dying, not a superstition or a convention, where it is living and true, is always nobly practical, both the guardian of order and peace and the inspiration and ally of true social progress. It will be an evil day when the Churches fall out of correspondence with the growth and manifold needs of our great cities. The England of the next half-century cannot fail to be a different England in many respects from that in which we have grown up, and it depends very much upon the Churches what the character of the change is to be.

I remember reading, years ago, a chapter of religious autobiography which had this significant and suggestive title, "How I left the world to come for that which is." The pilgrimage from the world to come to that which is represents the direction which religious thought and life have been taking these many days and are bound to take more and more in the coming days. We have woke up at last to the folly and wrong of neglecting present and practical problems in the name of other world interests and concerns. We have come to see that the two worlds and the two lives cannot be separated, that the city in the sky is best reached through the streets of our own city, and that we are living for heaven when we are living as we ought for earth. The mission of the Church is to bring spiritual ideas and laws and forces into the life of every day—to bid eternal truth be present fact. And it is impossible to exaggerate the social and secular importance of the witness and work of the Church. The sense of a life in common cannot be given to irreligious and non-religious men. The son of man who does not regard himself to be a son of God will not long regard his fellow as a brother whom he is bound to help and serve in all best ways. Our noblest morality has its root in faith, and the service of humanity requires the moral life of religious inspiration to give it spring and enthusiasm. But not only for inspiration, but for instruction in righteousness has that Church a place and mission in that city. To live and do its work in this age of social questions, it must be an educational institution, the natural representative of moral authority, a teacher and interpreter of social duties, informing the mind and conscience, and helping to create a new and better mind and conscience in regard to many things. Its ministers and missionaries, to meet the present social demands, require a patient and sober education in the new problems of the times—require to make a special study of social conditions and ideals as well as of theology and philosophy. And it is good that our colleges are giving to theology a larger definition, widening out the study of it, so as to include not only the literature of devout men, but the literature of social science and philanthropy, accepting sociology not as a substitute for theology, but as a vital and essential part of it. For apart from worship and inspiration and teaching, the Church in the city has much direct and practical work to do in relation to the problems of justice and charity and honesty which no other organisation can do or do so well. Its work naturally belongs to the special field in which it is placed. It is surely anomalous for a Church to be working for enterprises on the other side of the globe and neglecting the opportunities and equally crying needs of the field around it. Many of the Churches need to have their eyes opened to the things that it is possible for them to do in their own neighbourhoods, to domestic as well as to foreign missions. Their field, it is true, is the world, but they ought to begin at Jerusalem, and in doing the best for Jerusalem they are, perhaps, doing the best for the world. In our great cities our Churches are called to be centres to which neighbourhoods and districts shall look for light and love and helpful service and not be disappointed, object lessons in true brotherhood, illustrations in actual life of the conditions which belong to an ideal society, to the kingdom of heaven upon earth. They need as their ministers and missionaries men with the passion of deep and wide human sympathies. It is "the man most man," Mrs. Browning says, who works best for men. Not long ago I heard one of our Labour leaders reviling the Churches, and saying, among other things, that ministers by their education were made unsympathetic toward the cause of the people. Now I do not believe that. Get men with hearts right and sound, and no amount of education will spoil them, as we say, or rob them of sympathy. Their disciplined sensitiveness will lead them not away from the world but toward it, and put them more in love with the simple things of life. It is a poor one-sided culture that takes the form of personal vanity and makes men cold and critical. True culture is the unfolding of all the best powers of life, the powers of the heart as well as of the head. And if, as it is often said, the more reasonable and spiritual forms of religious worship and teaching are suited only to people more or less educated, it can only be that ministers have not learned the art of putting things, or not caught the tone of sympathy. When I see good men seduced into all sorts of religious buffoonery in order to attract the people, I remember that their Master never drew from deeper fountains than when he spoke to ignorant Samaritans and to Galilean peasants. It was the people who heard him gladly, and it was the people who said that he spoke with authority and not as the scribes who claimed authority but had it not. But it is not enough that the ministers and missionaries be full of the spirit of the Master's compassion and sympathy; the men and women who make up the body of our Churches must have the same spirit. We sometimes wonder why men pass by our Churches to found clubs and orders and brotherhoods, and labour Churches, and ethical societies, and the like. They will have them, and ought to have them, until the Churches are what they ought to be—identified with all the high and wide interests of life, regarded and regarding themselves not as private luxuries and clubs for the benefit of the few, but as public means for the extension in the world of the Kingdom of God, which is the true kingdom of man. In one of his books, Oliver Wendell Holmes tells us that the world is full of the tribe of Pooh-Poohs. And our Churches also are full of them. To men who see visions and dream dreams and glow with enthusiasm and want to achieve great things, they cry, "Pooh, pooh, it can't be done." But what ought to be done can be done. According to the difficulty is the opportunity. A divine success is near as soon as we are ready to sacrifice customary conditions or prepossessions to attain it, and are filled with the passion of humanity, the passion of the Cross, the passion to get God's will done here in London as it is done in heaven, in that holy Jerusalem of our hopes and prayers.

Mr. PERCY ALDEN, Warden of Mansfield House, in seconding the resolution, said he was glad of that opportunity of expressing his sympathy with their work. He was grateful to Dr. Hunter for his defence of the true principle of the Church. On that subject they did not need conversion. All work done in a religious spirit was to them sacred. There was as much religion in "the poor man's lawyer" as in any other of their efforts of helpfulness. It was the religion of practical helpfulness that must be practised in the churches, then the working classes would respond. Too many people in the churches regarded the Bible as a sort of spiritual "Bradshaw," useful merely to give directions for a journey; it ought rather to be used as the text-book for a man's everyday life, and for the whole of his life. The church that took in the whole man, would before long take in the whole people. In Society at present there was too little justice—for the poor at any rate. While so many thousands of the people were forced to live in one-room tenements, it was idle to look for spiritual growth except in the very rarest cases, and they desired that everyone should have a fair chance of living an honest, decent, and happy life. His experience of life among the people in the East of London made him inclined to say that material improvement must come first; but they must use every means, and attend to the needs of the whole man. The cause of a vast amount of the evil they deplored was the lack of healthy interests in the life of the people. That was why gambling obtained such a fearful hold upon the working classes. And that was largely due to the churches, because they had not come forward to supply the lack. Hundreds of thousands of working men, he was convinced, did not think at all. Their only aim was to get through their work and then to get to the public-house. And the women were worse than the men, but that was not their fault. They were nothing but household drudges. He knew a woman who told him that for thirty years she had not been out of the house further than her own street. They must make these people think, and give them fresh interests for their life. That was a great work for such Missions as theirs, and they ought not to be discouraged, for they would find some good in everyone. He pleaded for the million-peopled Ghetto of that great city, whose voice was inarticulate, to whom the wealth of the city, the pride of the people and the Empire could be nothing. Their pathetic needs cried out for help, for something of the heavenly vision, for help from the great Father. Then they also would respond and rise up to make the nation great and good.

Dr. E. J. RUSSELL, of the South Eastern Agricultural College, then moved a resolution of confidence in the principles of the Mission, appreciation of the work of the missionaries, the Revs. F. Summers and W. Wilson, and of welcome to the Rev. S. H. Street. It was a special pleasure to him, he said, to move that resolution, because he and Mr. Street had for years worked together among the poor in Manchester, and he could bear testimony to his eminent fitness for that work. Dr. Russell then made a forcible statement as to the terrible conditions under which the poor are forced to live in great cities, and the inevitable evils which result, leading to a steady deterioration of the race. It was becoming more and more clear that for the inefficient man there was no room in modern society, yet brotherly kindness compelled them to care for these also. There was no one remedy for the evil. They must work steadily to raise the physical, intellectual, and moral condition of the people; and in such work their Missions could take a very helpful part.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT seconded the motion in a sympathetic speech, and it was very cordially passed.

The Revs. F. SUMMERS, W. WILSON and S. H. STREET each responded, and made earnest appeal for practical support in their work. Mr. WILSON showed how much inspiration was to be gained from work among the people, and how at the Mission they preached a gospel of practical helpfulness and religion in everyday life. The great help members of their churches could render was by simply showing personal interest and entering into friendly relations with the people.

Mr. STREET gratefully acknowledged the welcome he had received. There were many things in that work to discourage, yet it made an irresistible appeal to their sympathies; there was a constant revelation of self-sacrifice and heroism in the lives of the people. Their great work was to build up character, and fit the young to fight the battle of their life. He added his appeal to those who had the gifts to come with sympathy among the people and help in the work.

On the motion of Mr. F. W. TURNER, seconded by Mr. E. F. GRUNDY, the officers and committee were then elected, and a vote of thanks to Dr. Hunter was moved by Dr. Hicks and seconded by Mr. J. Harrison. Dr. Hunter, in acknowledging the vote, said that was the second meeting of their Mission he had attended, for he remembered years ago crossing London with his friend Dr. Forsyth (now Principal of Hackney College) to hear Dr. Martineau speak at their annual meeting. He had been very happy to accept their invitation. Dr. Hunter then closed the meeting with the Benediction.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE RECENT BAZAAR.

THE bazaar recently held in the Lower Mosley-street schools, proved to be a great success. The united efforts in raising £1,000 for the Association met with a gratifying response. A social gathering of bazaar workers was held on Saturday last at the Memorial Hall, when official statements were made. The Rev. Charles Peach, chairman of Bazaar Committee, presided over a large gathering.

The CHAIRMAN gave a hearty welcome to the workers and friends present who had so loyally and willingly helped to make the bazaar a success. Compared with other bazaars, they had been very modest in fixing £1,000 as the amount to be raised, and he fully believed that had they resolved upon thrice that sum it would have been obtained. However, they had been content to aim at the amount the Association needed.

Rev. A. COBDEN SMITH, bazaar secretary, followed with his report. He referred to the methods they had adopted since the Association decided in January, 1902, to hold a bazaar. They had appealed for the support of the local Sunday-school Unions with the hope that each would furnish stalls and raise funds for the Association of which they formed a part. The response had justified their expectations, and Manchester, Bolton, Bury, Cheshire, North-east Lancashire, and schools in unattached districts undertook to furnish the stalls required. The Committee of the Lower Mosley-street schools generously gave the use of their commodious premises, and the teachers and scholars of the same school promised to provide all refreshments required, and hand the proceeds to the bazaar funds. Further, Upper Brook-street school organised the advertisement stall, Rev. J. Moore the flower stall, the Rev. H. Kelsey White the book-stall, the Rev. J. M. Bass, M.A., the shooting gallery, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks the café chantant. The medal scheme, which owed its inception and entire management to the Rev. Charles Peach, had produced very gratifying results. A number of churches also readily consented to arrange Sunday collections on behalf of the bazaar funds. The dramatic and musical programmes at the bazaar itself were given by societies connected with the Bolton, Gee Cross, Gorton, Bradford, Longsight, Lower Mosley-street, Monton, Moss Side, Pendleton, Platt and Upper Brook-street Sunday-schools. The bazaar was held during Easter week, and was opened by the Lord Mayor of Manchester, under the presidency of Alderman Harry Rawson, J.P., and in the presence of a brilliant gathering. On the second day, Alderman Thomas Holt, J.P., of Bury, and Mr. J. Wigley, president of the Association, officiated in the opening proceedings. The children's day followed, and they had been favoured with the welcome assistance of Mrs. David A. Little and Mrs. Hans Renold, whose words of encouragement in performing the dutiest allotted to them were warmly greeted and appreciated. Two valued friends of the Association, Mr. George H. Leigh and Colonel Pilcher, officiated on the concluding day. At the close of the bazaar it was announced that £1,070 had been received. The final results had reached an amount which testified to the splendid services rendered by Sunday-school workers to their Association.

Mr. J. H. PIMLEY, bazaar treasurer, in a brief address presented his financial statement. He gave a detailed account of the various amounts received from all sources. The total proceeds were £1,164 2s. 2d., leaving a balance in hand for the Association, after all expenses had been paid, of £1,029 12s. 9d.

At the conclusion of the reports, Mr. J. WIGLEY, president of the Association, expressed the thanks due to the bazaar officials, whose efforts from first to last, he said, had been entirely successful. That gathering indicated the representative character of their organisation. Every section had co-operated in achieving the splendid result, and the individual service rendered had been a further source of valuable assistance. The encouragement he derived from such evidences was that their work was alive, full of vitality and promise.

Mr. DAVID A. LITTLE, secretary of the Association, in supplementing the remarks of Mr. Wigley, spoke of the usefulness of social gatherings of that kind, and thought it would be well to arrange meetings of a similar character during summer months, The remainder of the evening was spent in social intercourse, music and refreshment, and the Bradford orchestra, Brookfield Choral Society, Mrs. Southern and Mr. Harry Smith contributed enjoyable pieces which were much appreciated.

The gathering was a great success, and it should be stated that the entire expense was defrayed by a few friends in order to avoid the necessity of using any funds of the Association.

A. C. S.

THE MINISTERS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

SIR,—Are your readers—particularly those who are subscribers and donors to the above—aware how hardly the age-limit of membership in the Society bears upon a not inconsiderable section of our ministers? The Society is doing a good work, as all who know its operations acknowledge; but it might do a better work were it not for Rule III. It has a capital of about £60,000, roughly three times that of the recently established Ministers' Pension and Assurance Fund. Moreover, it not only provides annuities for ministers in their declining years, but helps them in seasons of sickness, and also gives annuities to their widows and orphans; being the only fund available for Unitarian ministers which does these two latter: the new fund having no department for these objects and the Widows' Fund being confined to Lancashire and Cheshire. But it restricts the opportunity of securing these substantial benefits to ministers under forty-five years of age. What makes the matter more hard, no intimation is given to ministers of the existence of this age-limit. At least, I myself was not made aware of the rule until I found it operating in my own case; indeed, until this, I had no official intimation even of the existence of the Society.

It is said, in support of this age-limit, that it encourages early provision on the part of ministers. But surely this object could be adequately attained by some system of graduated subscriptions, giving an advantage to those joining early and penalising those joining late, without enforcing so extreme, arbitrary, and undiscriminating a Rule as the present one. This Rule admits to membership at forty-four on just the same terms as at twenty-four; but at forty-five refuses admission on any terms.

This Rule seeks to encourage early provision by preventing any provision at all after a certain age, and this latter an age when, on the Society's own methods, full provision is practicable. The twenty years between forty-five and sixty-five would just suffice for the twenty annual payments which constitute complete membership, to say nothing of the provision which permits commutation by a lump payment of fifteen guineas.

This Rule is quite unsuited to the conditions of the Unitarian ministry, which is largely recruited by men who come (like the present writer) from other communions. Part of the penalty such men pay for their fidelity to conscience is that they have to surrender their interest in the benevolent funds of the religious bodies they leave. But this Rule further penalises them by refusing them admission (unless they are under forty-five) to the benevolent fund of the body to which they come. And yet, curiously enough, the constitution of the Benevolent Society is especially sympathetic—in the opposite direction—on this matter of conscience. A Unitarian minister who adopts Trinitarian views, and joins another communion, can remain a member of the Society. The official list of members contains in fact the names of two gentlemen who have for a number of years been clergymen of the Establishment. What an anomaly that men who have long ceased to minister in our group of churches should be eligible for the substantial benefits of this Society, while men who are at work in our midst, and expect to be so all their lives, are altogether debarred!

In all this no reflection whatever is intended upon the present or past managers of the Society, who are rather to be honoured for the time and trouble they have disinterestedly given to the carrying out of its objects. All that is meant to be suggested is the need for some revision of a constitution drawn up half a century ago. The Rule to which objection is taken probably had its origin in the double character of the Society. For, although it is in one sense strictly a benevolent society, recognising no legal rights on the part of its members to help, but regarding its grants as gifts, yet in another sense it is a mutual benefit society, for it demands certain payments from its members. And probably fifty years ago it was anticipated that this quasi business element in the working of the Society would be much larger than has actually proved to be the case. Rule XXIV. says:—

Application for benefit shall not be entertained for the first five years from the formation of the Society unless the General fund shall, in the meantime, amount to the sum of four thousand pounds.

Reading between the lines of this Rule it seems pretty plain that the original founders of the Society had little idea of the large sums from non-beneficiary sources which were in course of time to become available, and feared they might have to depend much more than has actually been the case upon the subscriptions of beneficiary members, that is upon the payments of the ministers themselves. Hence this Rule. It is framed in the spirit of the mutual benefit societies of that period, which were wont to exclude middle-aged men from membership with the object of getting the longest period of subscriptions from their clientèle along with the shortest term of eligibility for benefit. But that was fifty years ago. Since that time even such societies, with their strictly business basis, have, I believe, extended their age-limit. Any way, in that long interval the mutual benefit element in the Ministers' Benevolent Society has become quite insignificant. The vast bulk of the funds of the Society come not from ministers, but from subscribers and donors. They are given in fact, given by the Unitarian laity in order that Unitarian ministers may be succoured in sickness and old age, and that after their death their widows and orphans may be succoured also. And I would put it to the Unitarian laity whether it is their will that some Unitarian ministers should be entirely excluded from these benefits just because they are over forty-five. And I would put it to those Unitarian ministers who have the good fortune to be members of this Society whether it is their will that any of their brethren should be debarred from benefits which they themselves value so highly.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

APPEALS.

For the Children.—Miss Jennett Humphreys desires to thank the many friends who responded to her appeal for picture cards for the children, some of whom gave no name or address for a personal word of thanks.

London (Stratford).—Friends of West Ham Lane Sunday-school are reminded that the children's summer treat in Epping Forest depends on their accustomed gifts. Mr. G. Shute, 53A, Romford Road, is the secretary.

Glasgow.—The Monthly Record of the St. Vincent Street Church appears this month with a cover, bearing on its front a picture of the church. Grateful appreciation of Miss Pritchard's recent visit is expressed, and the Rev. J. Forrest, Mr. James Graham and Dr. Barlow give their impressions of the Liverpool Conference.

Halstead.—Rev. T. E. M. Edwards conducted the annual "Flower Service" in the Free Christian Church on Sunday, and took for his subject, "Moralising among the Flowers." A solo, "Consider the Lilies," was also sung. Flowers were kindly sent by friends living at Colne, Halstead, and Braintree.

Hapton. — Sparsely scattered over the country districts in East Anglia, are found the evidences of our Presbyterian forefathers. At Hapton, in Norfolk, one of these remnants of the olden times still exists. The manse and the meeting-house, with its adjacent burial ground, lie embosomed amid trees and shrubs and flowers of varied hue, a haven of rest in the past for many of our old ministers. The recent death of the Rev. James Knapton has given the trustees and congregation an opportunity of appointing a new minister, and of renovating the old meeting-house. So completely has this been done, that few would recognise in the now neat and compact building, the dilapidated structure of years gone by. Matchboarding has supplied the place of whitewashed walls, while the galleries have been restored and pews renewed; a centre door with a porch has taken the place of the two former entrances, and a new harmonium supersedes the one in former use. At a meeting of the congregation and trustees recently held, Mr. Alfred Rump, many years superintendent of the girls' Sunday-school at the Octagon, Norwich, was elected by the congregation and confirmed by the trustees to the vacant ministry. Mr. Rump's acquaintance with Hapton dates from an early period. The formal induction of Mr. Rump into the ministry and to the charge of the congregation took place on Wednesday, 20th inst., when the Revs. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, Lucking Tavener, of Ipswich, and John Holden, Congregational minister of Norwich, attended. From the neighbouring districts many friends made their way on foot to this evening service. The address to the congregation and the minister was given by Rev. John Holden, who dwelt upon the importance of Christian unity and brotherly love. The devotional part of the service was taken by the Revs. A. Hall and L. Tavener, who gave the right hand of fellowship and welcome into the ministry.

London: Mansford-street.—A special service was held in the Mansford-street Church, Bethnal-green, on Sunday evening last, May 24, for the reception and dedication of gifts to the Church in memory of Miss E. J. Garrett. The gifts consisted of the following:—(1) A mural panel in opus sectile with four figures, representing works of beneficence and illustrative of the text, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto Me," by Henry Holiday; (2) an embroidered cloth for the communion table, designed by the Royal School of Art Needlework and worked by the younger members of Miss Garrett's class; (3) a beaten copper flower vase, the offering of Mrs. Ryman. There was a large and sympathetic congregation. The Rev. John Ellis conducted the service. The special music consisted of a duet, "The Lord is my Shepherd," and a solo "But the Lord is mindful of His own." The panel was unveiled by Mrs. Percy Preston, and the cloth by Miss Carrie Norman. These ladies made touching reference to the friendship and devotion of the departed, and in loving memory dedicated the gifts to the service of the Church. In his address, Mr. Ellis spoke with much feeling of the far-reaching effects of Miss Garrett's influence, and the inspiration they must derive from such an example of consecrated work in the loving spirit of Jesus. She had given herself utterly to the work of helpfulness, among those whose need was greatest.

Maidstone.—On Wednesday, May 20, the Annual Congregational Meeting was held. A good number sat down to tea, and the number was increased by others who attended the meeting only. The Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A., presided. The congregational report was read by the secretary (Mr. F. W. Ruck), and reports relating to the Sunday-school (Miss Ellis, superintendent and secretary), the Sewing Circle (Miss Gegan, secretary), and the Young People's Guild (Miss Peters, secretary) were presented to the meeting. In the chapel report attention was drawn to the fact that during the year a special fund, amounting to £79 4s. 6d. had been raised; £41 17s. of this sum had been contributed by the members, and the remainder had been provided by the generosity of outside friends. By the aid of this fund, the organ had been thoroughly restored at a cost of £32 10s., and the deficit of the previous year met. All the reports were of a satisfactory nature, and indicated a spirit of energy and hopefulness in all departments of church life. Testimony was borne to this effect by Messrs. W. Gegan and W. Coats in moving and seconding the adoption of the congregational report, and also by Messrs. A. J. Ellis and F. W. Ruck in speaking on the work of the chapel and associated institutions. Mr. John Harrison, who was warmly welcomed as the representative of the Provincial Assembly, and who was characterised by the chairman as a splendid worker for Unitarianism, gave a sympathetic and encouraging address, for which he was afterwards heartily thanked. The Rev. S. S. Brettell expressed his deep gratitude to all the various speakers for their appreciative references to his own work. He especially appealed to the young people to take upon themselves a large share of the duties of the church. An enjoyable entertainment followed.

Newchurch. — On Sunday last the school anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. John Page Hopps, of Leicester. Crowded congregations listened to two inspiring discourses, and when evening had come the testimony was given, on every hand, that it had been good to be there. The collections were in advance of last year, and amounted to £53 16s.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Sunday, May 24, the 215th anniversary of this Church was held, when the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, conducted the services. On Monday, the 25th, an enjoyable conversazione was held in the schoolroom, attended by friends from Middlesbrough, Darlington, and the district. Alderman John Green presided, the Revs. Charles Geeson (Congregationalist), Frank Walters, Henry Cross, and Mr. W. J. Watson delivered short addresses. The anniversary celebration was full of encouragement.

Sunderland. — A very enjoyable concert was held in the Unitarian Chapel, Bridge-street, on May 20, to help to clear off the balance due in respect of the re-decoration of the chapel (the sum recently raised by the bazaar not being quite sufficient for that purpose). Mr. Chas.

E. Thompson (a well-known layman in the town, of broad views, though not himself a Unitarian) presided, and also gave a subscription. Several well-known artistes from Newcastle and South Shields kindly gave their services, and the concert was a most successful one, though the audience might with advantage have been a little larger.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union. — On Saturday last, in place of the usual quarterly conference of teachers, the committee had arranged for a ramble, the rendezvous being the extensive, picturesque, and historic district of which the Shibden Valley is the centre. Many of the schools in the Union were represented, the Halifax and Bradford contingents being especially numerous. The exploring party, to the number of about 100, had for their guide Mr. Jagger, of Pepperhill. Many historic events were mentioned and places pointed out en route, which were both interesting and instructive, and the party reached the Pepperhill Chapel about six o'clock, where tea had been provided. The company included the Revs. Chas. Hargrove, C. Harvey Cook, and W. T. Eastlake. After tea, congratulatory and encouraging addresses were delivered by Mr. J. Jagger, Mr. Fred Clayton, the Rev. W. H. Eastlake, the Rev. C. H. Cook (advocating the sale of the Union Chronicle or Seed Sower), and Dr. Griffiths. The singing of the Doxology and the benediction (pronounced by the Rev. C. H. Cook) brought the proceedings of a most enjoyable day to an end.

WE have more than once called attention to the admirable work done by the Children's Flower Fund in sending boxes of flowers for the children in elementary schools in London. The last annual report gives the following particulars :—

The work of the Fund goes on steadily increasing. During the year 1902, 738 boxes of flowers (including 14 large hampers) were sent to London Schools, as against 642 in 1901, and the number of schools or departments of schools supplied rose from 71 to 77. One school received a box containing 150 bags of lavender, and another a bag of walnuts. In addition to the flowers, nine boxes of shells were sent to various schools, and the teachers in every case welcomed these and found them very helpful in object lessons, &c.

A few more country schools have been added to the list of senders, and we hear from teachers, both in London and the country, of the pleasure which the interchange of letters gives the children. One Head Mistress of a country school writes :—"My girls will be very pleased to send flowers and letters again this year. They have sent letters only this month (January) as they could not find anything worth sending, but when the snowdrops come they will be delighted to send some. They very much enjoy both writing and receiving letters from the London children. I am sure they would be very grieved to discontinue either sending the flowers or letters."

The increasing work of the fund resulted last year in an adverse balance of £1 11s., the total expenditure being £15 5s. 9d. Subscriptions may be sent to Miss M. S. Beard, 20, Christchurch-road, Hampstead, N.W., who will be glad to hear of any friends willing to undertake to send flowers.

AT five Wesleyan Synods, including those of Liverpool and Manchester, resolutions have been passed by large majorities asking Conference to consider the desirability of amalgamating the existing organisations specially dealing with the young, viz., the Wesley Guild, the Sunday School Union, and the Bands of Hope; these to be united in a department to be called the Young People's Department.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY

At the ANNUAL MEETING held on WEDNESDAY, May 27, 1903, at Bell-street, Edgware-road, the Rev. JOHN HUNTER, D.D., in the Chair, the following resolutions were passed :—

1. Moved by the Chairman, and seconded by Mr. Percy Alden :—
"That the Report of the Committee, and the Statement of Accounts, together with the Reports of the Missionaries, be receiveed and adopted."

2. Moved by Dr. E. J. Russell, and seconded by Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A. :—
"That this Meeting desires to express its continued confidence in the principles of the London Domestic Mission Society, and to record its appreciation of the earnest and faithful labours of the Missionaries, the Revs. F. Summers and W. Wilson, during the past year. It also desires heartily to welcome the Rev. Sydney H. Street, B.A., on his settlement at Bell-street, and to wish him and Mrs. Street every happiness and success in their new work."

3. Moved by F. W. Turner and seconded :—

STUDIES IN THEOLOGY.

Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net.

THE UNITARIAN BIBLE MAGAZINE says:—

"That the essays are scholarly and eloquent, spiritual and practical, is guaranteed by the names of the authors. . . . In these essays will be found an admirable model of the spirit in which the religious teacher should approach the deep questions involved in the stern facts of life."

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN says:—

"A number of essays and lectures of real value. . . . The collaboration strikes us as distinctly happy, and the result is a volume with an underlying unity of aim which is likely to attract a good many readers by the freshness with which some of the living problems of religious thought are handled."

OTHER WORKS by the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, M.A.:—

WHIT-WEEK ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

OUR anniversary week has been fortunate in pleasant sunny weather, all the pleasanter because the great heat of Monday was followed by a certain keenness in the air, and there has been a delightful gathering of friends from all parts of the country. Of friends and fellow-workers from distant lands, as will be seen from the reports, several were present, and added greatly to the pleasure and helpfulness of the meetings. Let the cable greeting from the President of the American Unitarian Association read at the business meeting of the home Association, stand here also at the beginning of our record:—

"President Armstrong, Essex Hall.

"Affectionate greetings from America. Read Titus iii. 15," which reads:—"All that are with me salute thee. Greet them that love us in the faith. Grace be with you all. Amen."

The meetings began, as last year, with that of the Sunday School Association, held on Tuesday afternoon, followed by a reception by the President and Committee for tea in the Council-room. Later in the evening Mr. Augustine Birrell gave the Essex Hall Lecture, on Emerson, to a crowded audience. Needless to say, the lecture was full of sparkling wit and humour, and contained some memorable sayings, as that Watts's hymns (Mr. Birrell meant, of course, the moral songs) were written for a crowded nursery! That those to whom Emerson has been an inspiration will be satisfied with the lecture, we do not think; but it was full of interest, and when it is published it will deserve careful study, and may be profitably read with Mr. Birrell's other essay on the same subject in Obiter Dicta.

The annual religious service of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held on Wednesday morning in Little Portland-street Chapel, which was filled by a large congregation. The service was conducted by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Kidderminster, who read as lessons from Isaiah lv. and Galatians v. The opening hymn was Dr. Sadler's "To God, most high, draw nigh!" and the closing hymn, Stopford Brooke's "Arm, soldiers of the Lord!" the other two being Hosmer's "O Name, all other names above," and Samuel Longfellow's "Holy Spirit, Truth Divine." Mr. John Harrison presided at the organ, and the service included his setting of the Te Deum, which has some passages of very beautiful harmony. The sermon, which was preached by the Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., of Ann Arbour, the representative of the American Unitarian Association, we hope to print in full next week. It was a powerful statement of the Unitarian conception of religion in these latter days, and a moving appeal for loyalty in bearing witness to its truth and helpfulness. The text was from 1 Timothy i. 11., "The glorious Gospel of the Blessed God."

At the conclusion of the service the President and Committee of the Association entertained a number of representatives of district associations and other unions and societies and a few other friends to luncheon at the Holborn Restaurant, when certain toasts were duly honoured and eloquent speeches, which we may not report, were made.

In the afternoon followed the annual business meeting of the Association, and, after an interval for tea, a public meeting in Essex Hall, of which a full report will be found in our present issue.

On Thursday morning, after a brief devotional service, conducted by the Rev. J. E. Stronge, followed the Conference, with papers by Miss Westenholz, of Copenhagen, on "The World-Mission of Unitarianism," and Mr. J. C. Warren on "The Work which is demanded of Unitarians in England To-day." These, with a report of the discussion which followed, we hope to publish next week. The other meetings of the week, that of the Central Postal Mission and the National Unitarian Temperance Association, also remain to be reported. The Conversazione at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours concluded, as usual, the meetings of the Unitarian Association.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the Association was held at Essex Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, the President, the Rev. James Harwood, in the chair. Among those on the platform were Dr. and Mrs. J. H. Crooker, of Ann Arbour, U.S.A., Miss Marian Pritchard, Persident-Elect, and Mr. J. Wigley, representing the Manchester District Association.

After an opening hymn, the treasurer, Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., made his annual statement, and explained the unsatisfactory nature of the balance-sheet, as indicated below. Annual subscriptions stood at £303 9s., an increase of £11 on last year; but that was quite inadequate to meet the needs of the work. The chief expense had been in the publication of books, and he appealed to those present to buy the books and make others buy them.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD, the hon. secretary, presented the annual report.

THE REPORT.

The report opened with a grateful tribute to the memory of the late Mr. I. M. Wade, who had passed away since the last annual meeting, having held office for over forty-five years as hon. secretary, president and vice-president of the Association. The record of the year's work showed great activity. The expenditure for printing and binding had been £657 2s. 4d., larger than ever before. In this work the Read Publication Fund had been a great help; but the Committee regretted that the increased activity in producing new books had not been met by a corresponding sale, and an appeal was made to superintendents and teachers to make themselves acquainted with the books and other helps issued by the Association. Particulars were then given of the successful autumn meeting at Newcastle, and of meetings of local societies at which the Association was represented; also of the summer session for teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, last July, attended by over 100 students. The next summer school, it is hoped, will be held in 1904. Among the new publications were another volume of the perennial Young Days, edited by the Rev. J. J. Wright; "Elizabeth Fry," by Miss J. E. Brown; a musical service, "Joseph," by the Rev. J. L. Haigh; and a new edition of the "Sunday School Hymn Book," edited by the Rev. Dendy Agate. A book of "Twelve Addresses to Children," by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong was just issued. A good deal had also been done in providing sets of lantern slides for loan to schools, with lectures or other appropriate readings. As to finance, the balance sheet, with a total of £1,509 6s. 1d., showed the adverse balance reduced from £59 15s. 8d. to £58 1s. 2d., but that had only been secured by spending a legacy of £50 from the late Miss C. A. Martineau, selling £100 of stock, and a loan of £101 19s. from the Read Fund. The largest item on the expenditure side was £346 15s. 2d. for the printing of books, one of the chief objects of the Association. Clearly, therefore, a larger income is required.

In presenting the report, Mr. Pritchard emphasised the need of greater efficiency in the Sunday-school correspondents, through whom their business with schools throughout the country was carried on. It was their duty to bring the letters received and books sent down, before the notice of their teachers, and this was sometimes neglected, so that recently he had found a superintendent who did not know that the Association issued a select catalogue of suitable gift and prize books (which had been done annually for about twenty years). When a correspondent (as one had confessed) was too busy to attend to the matter, another should be appointed. Mr. Pritchard also called attention to the slides which had been prepared, to illustrate Miss Wiggin's story, "Timothy's Quest."

The President, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, paid an affectionate tribute to the memory of their dear old friend, Mr. Wade, whom they had lost since the last annual meeting. He then proceeded to speak of the value of the local Associations, as bringing the schools of each district more closely together. He had travelled a good deal lately among the churches in different parts of the country, and had been interested to gather information as to the expenditure of their Sunday-schools. From sixteen schools of very various character, and in different parts of the country, he had obtained particulars. Those sixteen were about 5 per cent. of the whole number, with 3,230 scholars. The amount they spent on Sunday-school work was £454, which was about 2s. 6d. per scholar. On literature, they spent only £13 6s. 6d., less than a penny a head. Twelve of the schools had spent nothing on books, and one of the schools, that of Leigh, Lancashire, spent as much as 9d. per head. Those were facts, however to be explained, which ought to be seriously considered by their teachers throughout the country. In conclusion, he paid a warm tribute to the indefatigable and devoted work done for the Association by Mr. Pritchard as hon. secretary. They were under a deep sense of obligation for the faithful and effective way in which he had carried on the work for years.

Mr. Harold Wade seconded the resolution, and said he was very glad of that opportunity of thanking the members of the Association for the great sympathy they had shown to his father during his last illness. A message sent from the annual meeting two years ago had been a special gratification to him, of which he had frequently spoken. He had been ever a militant Christian. Many a friendly blow had been delivered and received by him on that platform, and the further north he went, the harder he hit, knowing the character of the people, and received, no doubt, as good knocks back. But he never made an enemy. His friends knew that he was in earnest, and no work was closer to his heart than that of the Association.

The resolution having been unanimously adopted, the Rev. C. J. Street moved a resolution of thanks to the officers and Committee, and their election for the ensuing year, Miss Marian Pritchard being elected President. She, he said, was known to all their schools, if not to all under her own name, yet as "Aunt Amy." As to the work of the Association, he said they in the north recognise it as national, and they valued especially their publications.

The Rev. H. Rawlings seconded the motion, and bore testimony to the appreciation of their publications by outsiders. He was delighted that they were to have Miss Pritchard as President, and suggested that, as women played so large a part in Sunday-school work, they ought to be represented on the Committee by more than the one other member they now had.

The resolution having been very cordially passed, the President put the following resolution to the meeting, expressing the particular gratification it was to them to be able to welcome Dr. Crooker and Mrs. Crooker at that meeting:—

That the hearty welcome of this meeting be given to the following representatives of affiliated and kindred societies:—American Sunday Schools, Mrs. Crooker; Irish Non-Subscribing S.S. Association, Rev. James Kennedy; Scottish Sunday School Union, Rev. William Wilson; South Wales S.S. Union, Rev. T. J. Jenkins; Bolton District S.S. Union, Rev. J. J. Wright; Liverpool Sunday School Society, Miss Alison Hall; London Sunday School Society, Mr. John Harrison; Manchester District S.S. Association, Mr. J. Wigley; Midland S.S. Association, Mrs. Wright; North Cheshire S.S. Union, Rev. W. Harrison; North-East Lancashire S.S. Union, Mr. J. T. Bibby; North-Midland S.S. Association, Miss Catherine Gittins; Southern S.S. Union, Rev. Clement E. Pike; South Cheshire S.S. Union, Rev. James C. Street; South-Eastern S.S. Union, Rev. Frederic Allen; Western Sunday School Union, Rev. H. Shaen Solly, M.A.; Yorkshire Sunday School Union, Rev. John Ellis.

The welcome was acknowledged by the Revs. T. J. Jenkins, of Trebanos, and H. S. Solly, of Bridport, who spoke, the former of the work of the Welsh Schools, their love of their native language, and the systematic instruction given to the children, the latter especially of the value of the books published by the Association, and of good slides for Sunday-school use. He urged that slides should be prepared to illustrate courses of systematic Bible instruction.

The Education Bill.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, M.L.S.B., then moved the following resolution:—

That this meeting resolves to offer its strenuous resistance to the Education Bill for London now before Parliament:—(1) because it will seriously diminish educational efficiency and destroy direct popular control; (2) because in the case of denominational schools it violates the principle that institutions maintained out of public funds should be under complete public control; (3) because teachers in the schools, who are practically civil servants, should be free from sectarian tests and subject only to public authority.

They could not be too thankful, he said, that the mischievous Bill introduced by the Government had been practically destroyed, and chiefly by the criticisms from their own side of the House, so that unity of administration was preserved for London. At the same time, efficiency could not be secured by tacking on education as an extra for the County Council, and the Bill in its present form, like that of last year, was fundamentally wrong and unjust, on the second and third counts of the resolution. What he felt most keenly was the injustice of theological tests imposed on teachers, not merely for their own sake, but for the sake of the children. It prevented them from getting the freest minds and noblest characters to bear on the mind and character of the children. The test was not only an intellectual, but a moral difficulty, and they must continue their protest, till the injustice of the Bill was done away. He was not in favour of what was known as passive resistance, but felt that Liberals ought to go in and make the best use that was possible of the Act, while still working for something better. The time could not be far distant when they would have to get rid altogether of the religious difficulty in national education. The present teaching of religion, both in Board and voluntary schools, was often beneath contempt; but then an enormous new field would open out for the teachers of religion.

Mr. Ronald Bartram, who seconded the motion, said that he was glad they were falling into line with other Nonconformists in their protest, and dwelt upon another blot in the Bill, in the exclusion of women from the work, in which on School Boards they had taken such a prominent and efficient part, except through the indirect means of co-option.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

The Conference.

The two following papers were then read by the Revs. T. P. Spedding and W. G. Tarrant.

THE BIBLE AND THE LITERATURE OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

I. The Bible.

BY THE REV. T. P. SPEDDING.

Let it be assumed, first, that there is a desire for an extended use of the Bible in the Sunday-school; and, second, that the Bible can be made more useful.

Then that there are plenty of books about the Bible, teachers' aids in abundance; such a multiplicity of helps and explanations that it is conceivable some exceptional teacher might give a long series of Biblical lessons without having opened the Scriptures themselves.

There is room, however, for a closer acquaintance with the Bible itself. History, chronology, genealogy, criticism, doctrine, these are dealt with amply. But probably the majority of our teachers have given little systematic study to these questions. Even where they have, while they are communicating their views and information, the Bible itself may remain a closed book. This kind of work is, of course, necessary, but alongside of it there should be some method that would familiarise us with the actual Scriptures. To suggest the issue of a book or series of books, in readable compass, that should include everything which pertains to the Bible's beauty, usefulness, and real inspiration; that is the object of this paper. The justification follows.

It is not likely that our scholars have been generally "drilled" in the Bible as Ruskin was. The average child is not prepossessed in its favour. It makes a very rare appearance in the home circle. It is often clumsily handled in the class, and the scholars are impatient. At a later stage they learn of coarse pleasantries at its expense, and those have more effect than half-hearted and half-doubtful teaching. Still later a different interest is aroused. Young people have to make some sort of apology for the faith that is supposed to be in them. They would give a great deal then to quote texts as glibly as their opponents, and to speak of the Bible with as much confidence. But probably this deeper interest comes too late. They were never trained. Our people too often prefer to leave these things until the children are "old enough to think for themselves." And when they are old enough they don't know how! They are at a loss with the Bible; don't know where to look for what they want; don't know how to start. They want a royal road at that moment. Perhaps they get hold of a Unitarian catechism or handbook. But that only puts the Bible into their hands as a weapon, and ministers not to edification, but to controversy. No book of the kind can make the Bible into a treasury of sacred poetry and truth. If the Bible itself is put into the hands of these young folk, they look at its 1,536 pages and leave them. The Bible is too big to be useful.

Many of the teachers had this experience as scholars, and it is only the few who have had special advantages. The many teach ineffectively because they are uncertain of their ground. What they do know is that they are not supposed to say "Amen" to their Bible, like the orthodox. They know not when to go on, and when to stop. They call themselves by the Unitarian name, or by some parallel or equivalent term, and they realise a few central ideas; but the faith has not been made sufficiently clear to give them the opening to these sacred things. They are aware of the existence of the critical spirit, but of its findings they have little knowledge. Probably many imagine that much more is disputed than is really the case. What is generally known of criticism is probably the least helpful part. When it comes to be applied, it is unpleasant to the teacher to be telling the class that this is wrong, and that is not reliable. You cannot well enforce the value of a book whose contents you are constantly disputing. On the other hand there is diffidence in dealing with a passage that contains difficulties, if you are not sure that the explanation is sound. On the whole it is easier to refrain from using the book at all. There may be many schools exempt from these conditions, but my experience would be singularly unfortunate if I were alone in supposing that something of what is here described were true of only a few schools.

There is, however, another side. There is almost always a keen interest, perhaps not actually in the Bible itself, but in many of the discussions arising out of it. I understand that the recent deliverances of the German Emperor had something to do with the choice of the present topic. But there are justifications for it closer to hand. The admirable issues of the Rationalist Press Association have quickened interest, and in the Lancashire district the articles of Robert Blatchford ("Nunquam") on Science and Religion have much attraction for the man in the street. The tendencies of all these, of course, is more or less hostile to the Bible—very markedly so in "Nunquam's" articles. And any attack upon Christianity or the Bible is gratifying to some. But there are others, surely, who are not gratified. They are conscious that there is still something to be said for the Bible, even though they would not dispute the hostile exposition of any isolated passage. Only they have not the acquaintance with the Bible which is necessary to make these other things clear. I am not inclined personally to make any plea for some of these selected passages, except that they reflect the ideas of the age they belong to. Let them be so ruthlessly exposed that men shall never believe in them again. Let them be thankful to the enemy that this apparent dis-service has proved a service. But the fear is that the whole shall suffer with the part; and what is wanted is something that shall make a man sure that while all these objectionable things may go without a murmur from him, imperishable things remain. And he must be able to come upon the good things of the Bible without wading through all these books as they now are.

In addition to helping a person to understand this and that about the Bible, help is needful that he may sort it out, as it were, for himself. Take the First Book of Chronicles as an example. It has 29 chapters, occupying 40 odd pages in an ordinary edition. The first eight chapters have 363 verses, where 20 would suffice. They consist of long lists of names which are summed up in the first verse of chapter 9 in the words, "So all Israel were reckoned by genealogies." This accounts for 15 pages. Of the remaining 21 chapters, 329 verses contain all that is necessary, and 240 verses might be left out. The book, then, contains 930 verses, of which 580 are useless to the general reader. What happens? The book is largely composed of these lists of names which the average reader never wants to read, and which he would be no better for reading. The first impression is enough, and probably the book is left alone, with the result that some of the finest passages in the Bible are lost sight of. You have the prayer of David in the 16th chapter; the decision to build the temple in 17; the addresses to Solomon in 22, 28 and 29; and these chapters contain some of the noblest sentiments in the Old Testament. By some means it should be possible for the reader to come quickly at these passages, without having to toil through every page.

The book might be reduced to the compass indicated without interfering with its real completeness. But in this reduction you do not want merely to select passages which might be unobjectionable in the present day. In many cases there might be very little left, if you had to expunge everything to which exception could be taken. The idea is that a person might take up a condensed edition with absolute confidence of seeing what the book teaches quite independently of his agreement with it. You do not leave out the questionable; only that which is unnecessary to the telling of the story, the drift of the teaching, and the presentation of the state of mind responsible for the composition of the book.

In this way the object differs from the very admirable work attempted by Miss Pritchard in her "Book of Beginnings." That left out things of which, presumably, "Aunt Amy" did not approve. She admits that a compiler cannot "transcribe all the unworthy attributes imputed to God," in preparing these books for children. Nor is it a book of Bible stories in the words of Scripture that is suggested; and it differsf rom "The Historical Parts of the Old Testament," published, I believe, for the Association, in 1852. But this book approaches most nearly to the present idea, and forms a precedent for action along this line. The cutting and carving must apply only to the size of the book. There must be no interference with the sense. If you are to give the spirit of a book, you must include the ideas which the author had in his mind. Only in that way do you become a reliable guide to the contents of the Bible, and if you are ever proved false to that spirit your influence is gone. The object is not to put the best face on the Bible, but to let it tell its plainest tale that men may read for themselves without the tedium of wading through irrelevant and uninforming matter.

It may be objected that opinions would differ as to the wisdom of leaving out certain lists of names. Take, as most important of all, the genealogies of Jesus. The bulk of those names, after all, are only names for the average teacher and reader. He is a very curious student who wants to examine them one by one. For his purpose the A.V. is always accessible, and it is not supposed that anyone desiring this close examination would content himself with anything less than the complete text. But the average reader hardly marks even the principal names; he reads them through rapidly, and there is an end of the matter. He wants to get on to the story.

But if the objection holds, so that nothing must be omitted, still it ought to be possible to indicate salient matter by bolder type. In the polychrome Bible, distinctions and periods of authorship are shown in colours, and in a less ambitious, but probably more useful work, it should be possible by varieties of type to distinguish the essential from the non-essential.

Not less important is the translation into the vernacular. The Bible suffers because it is not of the speech and language of to-day. The Twentieth Century New Testament is an illustration of what may be done by way of improvement in this direction. Take exception to its readings, but it makes the New Testament a readable book, and many a person who could scarcely have been induced to look at the old version has read this new translation with eagerness.

The limits of this paper prevent references to more obvious matters, such as chronological arrangement of books, and introductory notes.

And whether anything of the sort is possible I cannot discuss. That it is necessary I am convinced. I need the Bible in a handier form. I have imagined nothing in describing the relation of our young people and teachers to the Bible. I work among men and women, some well equipped and others less fortunate, but not less earnest. The best help for many of us, no matter what our advantages or disadvantages, would be, not another help to the Bible, but what might fairly be called a helpful Bible. As it stands, the book is almost worse than useless, because it is unwieldly. People are wanting to know what it is, but they dread attempting its dreary length, and a library of sidelights. And I sympathise with them. They have neither time nor knowledge to sort it out of and by itself. But they have the common sense and patience to read and understand a plain statement. They would welcome, for instance, the teachings of Jesus gathered together under headings; but they would not turn up the passages, if you simply gave the references. You want to let them see what he did say so far as the gospel narratives preserve the record. And it's worth while making it easy as well as plain.

Lastly, such a work would be carried through without doctrinal considerations. It doesn't matter whether one opinion gains or loses. All that has to be done is to put the reader into a better position for judging. What, then, I claim is a fair field and no favour for the Bible. I listen to those who pull the book to pieces with the feeling that they are as far from the truth as those who claim it as an inspired oracle. There are special pleadings on this side and the other, but the book, nowadays, practically never speaks for itself. Let the reasons for it be what they may, it is plain that we do not read as our forefathers are reputed to have read. We are not charmed by its eloquence, and our ears have waxed dull to its message. And yet we would give something to come easily at the secret of the Bible; and if this method were pursued we might in the end find that it was inspired by national, domestic, and religious sentiments. If men have mistaken these for the inspiration of God, they are next best to that, and they have in them the strengthening of men, who, stretching out lame hands in darkness, still touch God's hand, and are lifted into light.

THE BIBLE AND THE LITERATURE OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

II. Literature other than the Bible.

BY THE REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

With all respect to our Association, it ought not to exist—at least, as an agency to provide books for the Sunday-school. I hasten, however, to say that, as things are, I hope it will continue to exist until the happy hour is reached when, as teachers, we can do, as we should do, without literature altogether. It is because of the hardness of our hearts and the emptiness of our heads that we have any need of books in our class-work. The ultimate object of any true teaching, and especially of the Sunday-school, is not to put something into the scholar, but to get something out. I know that with older people it is as with dry pumps; you must often pour a bucketful in first, in order to get their valves to work. But it should not be so with children, restlessly alive, and with eager young people. The world is still fresh to them, and they are fresh to the world. The right kind of teacher—that archetypal entity of which it is understood a working model is kept somewhere downstairs in the office—if he only existed in the flesh, would never — or hardly ever — want printed pages when he came to his class. He would find there pages much more interesting, and he would know not only how to read them, but especially how to set them reading themselves. For is not this the final cause of the school: to enable the young mind to realise itself in contact with God and His world? We want it to become more and more alive to beauty, goodness, order, law, and loveliness in all shapes. The teaching of texts and the reading of paragraphs are doubtless of possible use to this end, but if, as sometimes appears, they are regarded as an end in themselves, the life and glory of the thing are gone. Why, a diner-out might as well be asked to swallow the menu card! Let us agree to this: the intelligent reading of good literature is helpful only as a means—it may supply subjects, furnish illustrations, keep the minds of scholars and teacher from wandering, and indefinitely increase the teacher's stock of wisdom; but if any other means will do as well, or better, it should be welcomed.

That being agreed upon, with all meekness because of our felt inadequacy, but with all sincerity because we want to do something real for our children, let us consider the resources laid open to us in our extremity by these books. Undoubtedly, those resources are great, both in variety and in extent. Of making of books there hath been no end; of using them aright there has been only a beginning! If we study our Association's goodly catalogue, and have the wit to take the trouble to look elsewhere as well, we cannot reasonably complain of a serious deficiency. Of course there is room, and always will be, for new experiments and illustrations, for new works by new writers to supplement or supersede the old. But candidly, is it not a little childish—with the childishness of the child who doesn't know how many toys he has—to be always grumbling that we haven't the right sort of books? What sort do we want? Is it biography, natural history, travels, tales, poems, science? Is it criticism, theology, philosophy, even? They are all to be had in plenty—and almost, though not quite, without money and without price. I am sorry for the poor school that cannot get a proper share of the right kind of books for its needs. But, after thirty years' experience, I protest that it isn't the right sort of book I want, but to be myself the right sort of teacher. And I believe that kind of teacher is really not very far away from any sincere well-wisher to his class. The right sort of teacher is hidden in every such heart, but he hasn't fully discovered himself yet. When he has done so, and has overcome his excessive reticence, he will be able to find the right sort of matter in almost any decent book; he will even know how to make the multiplication table a fountain of unceasing wonder, and the Shorter Catechism (or its Unitarian equivalents) a perennial joy.

Perhaps we may get glimpses of the right teacher as we pass along among our books. For convenience sake, I think four divisions of our literature may be marked. Where should we begin but at Picture Books? Under that term I would include many in addition to those prepared for infant classes, where the artist has caught, and held fast for leisurely inspection, some of the forms and colours that, in nature, dance to bewilderment about the child's eye. There are others, either actual collections of good pictures, engravings, photographs, &c., such as most people place, conspicuous but profitless, on their parlour tables or, on the other hand, those books that chiefly paint word-pictures, books that don't argue, don't moralise, don't exhort, don't plead, don't do anything but provoke to delight in beauty. Such picture books are but too little used, and children grow up unacquainted with the real forms of leaves and sprays, the contours of mountains and ripples of the sea, the shapes of clouds the glories of petals and shells, and feathers and crystals—some of which, at least, need no book to introduce them. I believe not only the very little children are to be benefited by these things—does not the Gate Beautiful lead us all into the sanctuary?

In the next division are the Story Books, which range outward from Parables truly worthy of the name to those doubtfully profitable tales which lie on the very circumference of the allowable. No doubt, a first-class teacher could take hold, if need be, of the flabbiest fiction that was ever served out to inoffensive childhood, and make even this serve to good result; but I think I have observed that it is usually the weaker brother or sister that succumbs to the temptation to read that sort of stuff to the children. But happily far inside this dubious circumferential region there is abundance of good material, tales of adventure, struggle, constancy, heroism, by which the most important principles of character may be stamped indelibly on the youthful memory. Ought a teacher to read tales to his class? Yes, if he can't tell them. But most certainly No, if he reads only to get through the hour with as little trouble as possible. Only pains come of taking none, and the last end of that teacher will be worse than the first. But the thoughtful worker can find an ample store of good literature of this kind — tales, e.g., of Greeks, of Scandinavians, tales from Shakespeare, and others more modern, well fitted to kindle love of the admirable and detestation of the mean and unworthy.

As a sub-section among Story Books, I venture to include biography. "Is it true?" asks the child; and if you must acknowledge it is "only made up," the matter is discounted. If you can say, "This is quite true; Bernard really lived; Catherine and Francis were once children like you"; the thing drives home—or it ought to do so. Only it must be admitted that genuine biography is rarely decked out so attractively as fiction is—whether that is due to the devil or not, I can't say. But if the life of a real hero or pioneer is given in rather unpicturesque colours in the book, so much the more need of that good teacher who is trying to be born in everyone of us. He reads through the life first, cuts its long thread into convenient lengths, seizes upon this incident, or that, for emphasis and an approach to dramatic rendering, and rehearses subtle efforts beforehand. In short, the book gives him the sticks and he makes the fire.

Passing from this class of books—in which our list is singularly rich, I think—we come to the third division, that, viz., of Fact Books. These range from the simplest notes on natural objects and daily occurrences up to the exactly scientific. Let me earnestly commend them to you. I know that some people are eager to warn me against imparting "mere facts" to the child. But the wise man knows no "mere facts"; he sees them in relation, and regards as a piece of printed lunacy the book that gives them otherwise. But I believe it is easier to starve a child's mind through lack of facts than to injure it by withholding philosophy and theology awhile. The people are "destroyed for lack of knowledge." How pitiful is the display by most children when a test-paper is set in day-school in "general information"! On the other hand, how many "false facts" (as to their own bodies, for instance), float about in the minds of older people! You and I have come to years when we have learned not only that but that the least thing that is true, in nature and in the life of man, is a finger-post to deepest mysteries. Indeed, all the books referred to thus far are subsidiary to this end—they serve as baits to attract the mind to facts, and as models to reveal their beauty and significance. No Sunday-school is worth much that doesn't leave with its scholars a definite impression of at least the most salient certainties with which they have to deal in this world—classes of objects, kinds of force, the parts and the relation of the parts—in a word, Science. Does anyone say this is better fitted for the day-school or evening class than the Sunday-school? He may be wise in his way, but he is not yet the right kind of teacher; else he would know that no surer ally to the moral law can be found than in the immutable veracity, the certain flow of cause to effect, which are revealed in the Universe. I think, too, that such a teacher will know how to drape the bare forms of science so as to wake the deepest awe and reverence in the scholar's mind. We all aim at evoking these feelings, but too often, as with unskilful painters, our art is all drapery with no living body, no downright bony skeleton, rigorously truthful beneath.

The last class of literature to which I would point is what may be called Thought Books. The names of theology and philosophy would do as well, if they were not rather fearsome. Happily, we have many good books to help children to think — printed talks, such sermons, e.g., as those of the late John Byles or Dr. Sadler. For older scholars there are special books like Smiles's, or Mr. Dendy's "Successful Life." But the right teacher finds thought-books about him everywhere, and he plays the part of mediator between the young people and the poets, preachers, and philosophers, who are so much to himself. But need I say that in proportion to the height of the aim the bow must be stretched? If it is injudicious to take even a picture-book to a class without previously mastering its contents, what shall be said of him, who at the eleventh hour or at a quarter to twelve (I speak parabolically) hurriedly snatches up the lesson book that is, forsooth, to teach the scholars to think! "This sort goeth not out, save by prayer and fasting." Let us remember what we are at. It is a great thing, though not difficult, to wake a child's mind to a feeling of delighted wonder at a pretty thing. It is not hard to kindle admiration of the heroic. But it is difficult to train aright a young thinker, not only to lead him to certain desired conclusions under stress of the guiding personality of the teacher, but in the end to leave him competent to think for himself in everyday crises. This difficult task is the crown of our Sunday-school work. It is worth some pains to attain such an end; and, again, without some pains it cannot be attained.

So here we come back to the original thought, viz., that all this literature, of Picture Books, Story Books, Fact Books, and Thought Books, and especially the more advanced, is but a help, and not a substitute for teaching. Be the message of the book what it may, before it gets into the scholar's head it should be well in the teacher's, and there receive (as the tradesmen say) his "best attention." I encourage my fellow-teachers to use this wealth of literature so, and to hope, confidently, that they will like their work better the better they work. I commend to my fellow-superintendents the care of the book-shelves, not only with an ear to the advertiser of our Association's wares, but with an eye to the real needs of their own special scholars, and even more to their teachers' aptitudes, for it is no good putting excellent books into hands that can't make use of them. And my last word is (with yours and Mr. Spedding's leave) about the Bible. I hope I have not suggested at all too imperatively the need for careful choice and much mental digesting in connection with other literature in our schools. But if I seem to have done so, let me warn any, whom ight be so disposed, against thinking that they will escape this responsibility and toil by the short and easy method of wedding themselves to the Bible, and, "leaving all other," cleaving to that alone. To be quite honest, and I hope not too blunt, there is no book more canted about than the Holy Scriptures; no book more badly used; no book so unintelligently flung at the heads of the hapless innocents; and, (Heaven be thanked for this retaliatory mercy), no book so unutterably bewildering and wearisome to the lazy teacher. And if one is not willing to accept for himself that unflattering description, if as a student of the Scriptures he is truly industrious, he will do well to remember Channing's word—

> He who studies nothing but the Bible does not study that book aright.

While we are learning to use the other books well that lie quite close to our modern life, we shall learn how to use our Bibles better.

For the discussion of the papers only a quarter of an hour remained, and the President could only call upon two speakers.

Mrs. J. H. CROOKER said if it was true that one touch of nature made the whole world kin, she could understand why it was she felt so much at home there. She had heard them discussing most earnestly some of the problems which were pressing closely on the attention of the American people. She wished that every minister and teacher in America might have heard those papers to which they had listened with so much interest and instruction. True, the conditions of life were different in the two countries, yet they were all of one family, pressing forward with the eternal truth before them, summoning to its rescue the best thought, study, and consecration of the world. So on either side, in the largest and truest sense, they were clasping hands across the water, working for the same high and holy purpose. There was one word she was glad to bring to them, which she could not have brought when she was in this country ten years ago. It was a most encouraging thing that now throughout the land there was a growing interest in the study of the Bible. The dust might indeed have grown a little thick on the lids of the Bible at home, but that was due not a little to the fact that they now saw the Bible was no longer to be read, but to be studied, and not merely in the curriculum of the college or school, but as a life study. The Bible was being opened as the text-book of life, and it was studied in that spirit. So from Boston to San Francisco the Bible had come into a new appreciation. The work which the great German and English scholars had done was familiar to them; it was one with that of their own best scholars; it was opening to them the wonderful pages of that wonderful book. Both Liberal and Conservative saw that they must know that book, if they would have a true appreciation of art. The Bible must be known as literature if they would know art and the best in music, and no less if they would write with an inspired pen or speak in the language of the orator, and catch the ear of the world. They must know that book and apply its masterful passages, if they would reach the people and bring them to their own position. So the Bible was used in all their best colleges, not compulsorily, but for voluntary study. A scholarly episcopal minister recently said to a Unitarian minister: "The Bible is a dead book. It is closed. We have to get at it another way, if we would bring it again into the hands of the people." That was what they were doing. They had an instance in the great university town where she lived (Ann Arbour) where four thousand students, men and women, were being educated together. There one of the first Biblical scholars of America had been twice brought down to teach the Bible from the orthodox standpoint; but the conclusions were just what they themselves held, and young men and women, who, perhaps for months together, never went to a church, had attended the lectures and found the teaching very beautiful. So the Bible was being opened wider and wider, and these scholars of Germany and Great Britain and America were the Martin Luthers of to-day, who were again giving the Bible to the people as a free, beautiful, glorious, inspired book of life.

Mr. J. WIGLEY, of the Manchester Sunday School Association, also spoke in warm appreciation of the two papers, and a vote of thanks to the President, the readers of the papers, and all the helpers, moved by the Rev. W. Harrison, seconded by Mr. Blake Odgers, acknowledged by Miss Marian Pritchard and the President, brought the meeting to a close.

THE ESSEX HALL LECTURE.

EMERSON AS THINKER AND WRITER.

THE Essex Hall lecture, associated this year with the Emerson Centenary, was given on Tuesday evening by Mr. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, K.C., the large hall being crowded. The chair was taken by the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who, in opening the proceedings, said they had hoped the chair on that occasion would be taken by Mr. Choate, the American Ambassador, but they had received from him the following letter :—

American Embassy, London,
April 2, 1903.

DEAR MR. BOWIE,—It would have been a great pleasure to me to accept your kind invitation to preside at Mr. Augustine Birrell's lecture upon Emerson in commemoration of his centennial birthday. Bnt at the date fixed, June 2, I expect to be on my way to New York to attend the wedding of my son, which takes place on June 6, and so I must, with great regret, decline the invitation.—Yours very truly,

JOSEPH H. CHOATE.

It was not their usage, the President said, to make any lengthened address before the Essex Hall lecture, and he should content himself with reminding them that the American Unitarian Association was founded on May 25, 1825, the twenty-second birthday of Ralph Waldo Emerson, while their own society was its junior by only twenty-four hours. Young Emerson, as Mr. Chadwick reminded them in his most interesting and delightful life of Dr. Channing, which had just appeared, was one of the first missionary preachers of the American Association. It was a striking presage of the progressive spirit which was to work in both societies throughout the century. They had that evening the privilege of welcoming amongst them one of the brightest English men of letters of their time, a man who stood also for progress and liberty in many spheres, and he was to discourse to them on the most exalted American master of literature. Through the lens of Mr. Birrell's vivid criticism they were to contemplate the profound and spiritual thought of that transcendent soul. He had peculiar satisfaction in asking Mr. Birrell for his address, in welcoming him, and thanking him for coming amongst them.

MR. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL then delivered his lecture, which was enriched by copious quotations from Emerson's prose and verse, and of which, as it will be immediately published by the Association, we must give only a brief account here.

The fact that Emerson was born a hundred years ago, the lecturer said, did not make his task any easier. Few men of the modern world had been more written about than Emerson, and by a greater variety of persons. Austere critics and wild ones, sober-minded folk and the veriest outlaws of thought had alike made him the subject of their appreciation. But Emerson had not only been written about, he had been read. He had been zealously read in the study and the pulpit, in college rooms, in poor men's dwellings, and in the open fields. Remembering what Lowell and Holmes had written, and Arnold and Morley, remembering also that marvellous correspondence between Emerson and Carlyle, he hesitated to add any criticism of his own. He proposed to speak first of the nature of the man himself and his genesis in Boston, and then of some of his dominant ideas.

Emerson, Mr. Birrell said, was more than an author, he was a living voice. He was a subtle influence, that had made all the difference in many men's minds. Since 1837 he had spoken in many an ear as hardly any other; he was, as Carlyle said, an epoch in his huge country's history.

The dominant Calvinism of New England, mitigated by human nature, which was never sectarian, was passing into Unitarianism when Emerson was born. So in that country of rapid movements they saw Channing come after Jonathan Edwards and Emerson in the pulpit of Cotton Mather. New England was then a quiet place, and the population was brought up in quiet habits. They no longer believed in human depravity, and virtue was common (Dr. Watts's hymns were written for a crowded nursery). Emerson came of a race of preachers, and remained a preacher all his life, and a Sabbatical man. He inherited the quiet assumption of his race that he had the right to speak and to be listened to. Authority had neither charm nor terror for him. "Whoever would be a man," he said, "must be a Nonconformist." History was little to him. He grazed his soul on all pastures.

> One accent of the Holy Ghost
> The heedless world hath never lost,
> I know what say the fathers wise—
> The Book itself before me lies,
> Old Chrysostom, best Augustine,
> And he who blent both in his line,
> The younger Golden Lips, or mines,
> Taylor, the Shakspeare of divines.
> His words are music in my ear,
> I see his cowled portrait dear;
> And yet, for all his faith could see,
> I would not the good bishop be.

It was a bewildering world in which they found Emerson and Newman both alive at the same time. In the thirties Boston was agitated as Oxford was, ready for tracts not against the times but for the times. The Oxford movement looked back to the fourth century, and aimed at restoring the Church to life and supreme authority. Boston looked forward to the unfolding of future mysteries and found the temple of the living God in the human soul. It was foolish to ridicule such movements. Tractarianism and Transcendentalism were both living forces, and ought to be reckoned with. Emerson himself acknowledged that there were queer folk among the Transcendentalists, but no saner man than he ever drew breath in New England. Carlyle wrote to him about the Dial :—

I love your Dial, and yet it is with a kind of shudder. You seem to me in danger of dividing yourselves from the fact of this present Universe, in which alone, ugly as it is, can I find any anchorage, and soaring away after Ideas, Beliefs, Revelations, and such like—into perilous altitudes, as I think.

To which Emerson replied :—

For the Dial and its sins, I have no defence to set up. We write as we can, and we know very little about it. If the direction of these speculations is to be deplored, it is yet a fact for literary history that all the bright boys and girls in New England, quite ignorant of each other, take the world so, and come and make confession to fathers and mothers—the boys that they do not wish to go into trade, the girls that they do not like morning calls and evening parties. They are all religious, but hate the churches; they reject all the ways of living of other men, but they have none to offer in their stead.

In America, Mr. Birrell said, the Emerson Centenary was being treated as a national event. And it was right that it should be so. He had written for his country patriotic songs.

> By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
> Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
> Here once the embattled farmers stood,
> And fired the shot heard round the world.

And he was one of those men who helped to make a nation great by making it self-respecting. The wide-spread celebration was at least a tribute to the things of the spirit by the things of the flesh. Emerson was an emancipator, not of black bodies, but of white men's minds. Fearlessness was one chief mark of his teaching, and another was optimism, based on his theory of compensation. That was sometimes looked upon as a whim, but it was in him the very pulse of the machine; and in every fibre of his being he was an individualist. Having spoken of the absence of any theology strictly so called in Emerson's teaching, and his faith in the greatness of the soul, the lecturer concluded: "Social unrest haunts both worlds. Fear sits at the bottom of men's hearts. 'Society,' said Emerson, 'is devoured by a secret melancholy, which breaks through all its smiles and all its gaiety and games.' It is so still. The nations live behind barricades, forging fresh weapons of offence and defence. Great guns and hostile tariffs have lost none of their vogue. If ever freedom shrieked, she might be expected to do so to-day. It is hard to be an optimist on the second of June, 1903. But at no time did the luckless race of man stand more in need of Emerson's spirit than it does at this moment. His splendid courage, his determination to quake at nothing, his spiritual independence and individuality, his lofty sense of the brotherhood of man, his undying cheerfulness, his sincerity, his peace, are qualities of which we stand sorely in need."

O air-born voice! long since, severely clear
A cry like thine in mine own heart I hear:
"Resolve to be thyself! and know, that he Why finds himself, loses his misery!" *

On the motion of Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., seconded by the Rev. C. HARGROVE, a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the Association was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the President, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., in the chair. Letters containing expressions of interest, sympathy, and goodwill for presentation at the Annual Meeting of the Association had been received from the following:—Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, Rev. C. E. St. John, and Dr. S. M. Crothers on behalf of the American Unitarian Association; Bishop Ferencz and Professor Boros for the Unitarian churches of Transylvania; Baron F. de Schickler, President of the Délégation Liberale; Dr. C. J. Niemeyer, secretary of the Nederlandsche Protestententenbond; Rev. Uffe Birkedal, of Copenhagen; Professor Bonet-Maury and Rev. E. Fontanes, of Paris; Dr. C. Schieler, of Dantzic; Dr. O. Veeck, of Bremen; Rev. Tony Andre, of Florence; Professor B. D. Eerdmans, of Leiden; Rev. Ph. H. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam; Professor E. Montet, of Geneva; Dr. Lunge, of Zurich; Professor Chatterjee, of Allahabad; Mr. Hem Chandra Sarkar, of Calcutta; Rev. William Jellie, of Auckland, New Zealand; Rev. R. H. Lambey, of Melbourne.

The minutes of the last annual meeting having been signed, the secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, presented the Report.

THE REPORT.

The Report, having referred to the prospect of new and enlarged work opened by the additional income of £3,000 secured through the offer of a friend of the President, and the response it had met, his £1,000 securing promises of another £2,000, gave a record of the past year's work. Grants amounting to £2,237 had been made to congregations and missionaries, and much valuable work had been done by special lectures, notably by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter's lectures on the Bible in various parts of the country, while the Rev. J. Harwood's visits to congregations had been much appreciated, and the Rev. J. C. Street had paid a helpful missionary visit to six towns in the Southern District. Grants had also been made for foreign and colonial work. It was specially gratifying to note that the new Unitarian Church at Auckland, New Zealand, promised to become self-supporting in less than five years from its formation. It was noted that Mr. Z. Toyosaki, the Japanese student at Manchester College, Oxford, would complete his course in June, and it was hoped that another student from Japan would take his place. Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., the Indian student, would also complete his course in June, and the Brahmo Committee, at Calcutta, had recommended Mr. V. A. Subktankar, of Poona, who had already done valuable religious work at Bombay and Poona, as his successor. The cordial good wishes of the Association were offered to Mr. Shinde and Mr. Toyosaki on their return home. Publications of the Association had gone to all parts of the world, and the Postal Missions had also been very active. Of new books in which the Association was directly concerned, Mr. Carpenter's "Bible in the Nineteenth Century" had been published by Messrs. Longmans & Co. The first edition of the Revised Essex Hall Hymnal had been quickly exhausted, and a second was being printed. Dr. Drummond's Essex Hall Lecture, "Some Thoughts on Christology," had been published, and a third edition of Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul." The five addresses on "Types of Religious Experience," delivered last Whitsuntide, had been issued in an attractive form, and quite recently an English edition of the Rev. J. W. Chadwick's new "Life of Channing." In Scotland, the expenditure of the McQuaker Fund included £615 for the new Church at Aberdeen (the balance of £750 granted), and it was noted that Mr. Ewart, the McQuaker student at Manchester College, Oxford, would complete his three years' course in June, and was going abroad as a Hibbert scholar. Under "Civil Rights" it was noted that at the Coronation in Westminster Abbey the President of the Association had represented the Unitarians of the United Kingdom, also that in view of the present education crisis in London the committee had gladly agreed to the secretary's again joining the London School Board, to which he had been co-opted as a member. Particulars were given of the autumnal meeting at Newcastle, and of other district meetings, at which the Association had been represented, and also of the coming meeting of the International Council at Amsterdam in September. In the obituary record, the loss of four members of the Council was deplored—Lady Bowring, Messrs. Frank Taylor and I. M. Wade, and the Rev. E. S. Anthony, and of a large number of subscribers to the Association. Among other faithful workers death had also removed the Rev. T. W. Freckelton, J. Panton Ham, and Henry Solly. The report concluded with the scheme for new and enlarged work, showing the lines on which the use of the new income of £3,000 is contemplated. The year's accounts showed an income of £5,021 (not including the balance from 1901 and a special £88 for Melbourne), an increase of £95 on the previous year. The total expenditure was £5,173, and the balance of £82 with which the year began was reduced to £19. The investment account had been increased by a donation of £1,000 from the late Field Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain, £250 from the sale of Thorne Chapel, and legacies from Miss E. A. Gibson, £100, Mrs. T. R. Dobson, £50, and Miss S. E. Squire, £50.

Mr. OSWALD NETTLEFOLD, as treasurer, presented the accounts, announcing that the annual collection that morning had been only £30 3s. 9d., less by £10 than last year, but if they had lost there, he said in a humorous phrase, they had been gaining in other ways. He drew attention to points in the accounts noted above, and then spoke of the great event of 1903 by which they had secured an additional income of £3,000. The response to the challenge of the President's friend had been so prompt and generous that they had received for the present year £2,167 to add to his £1,000. That total was reached by taking only a fifth of the donations of £335 which had been received, and which would be reckoned as subscriptions covering five years. Of the subscriptions promised, £1,146 was given without specified limit, £375 was promised for five years, £480 for four years, and £99 for three years. He wished, therefore, to impress it upon them that they had by no means yet done all that was necessary to secure that great subscription of £1,000 from their anonymous friend in coming years. In every subscription list the tendency was naturally to shrink by steady degrees, and, apart from other causes, five years hence from the list as now promised they would have over £1,000 to make up. They ought now to raise another £1,000, and thus show their gratitude to the donor for his gift, and also for showing what they themselves were capable of. Their friend, he was sure, would take that as the best possible mark of their gratitude to him.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the first resolution for the adoption of the reports and accounts, said that he must first read to them a cable received from America. The other day their American friends held their anniversary meeting in Boston, and a message of greeting had been sent to them. Yesterday he received from President Eliot, of the American Unitarian Association, the following cable message:

President Armstrong, Essex Hall.
Affectionate greetings from America. Read Titus iii. 15.

Which he proceeded at once to do from the Authorised Version:

All that are with me salute thee. Greet them that love us in the faith. Grace be with you all. Amen.

Turning to the resolution, he said that during the past year he had enjoyed the opportunity of becoming better acquainted with the work and with the spirit of the Association than ever before. A year ago he had faith, now he had knowledge. Like many another president, he had been profoundly impressed with the mass of quiet, beneficial, liberal, noble work done in the office of that Association. If they were to single out one man to whom they were indebted for the marvellous business grasp and method with which the affairs of the Association were directed, it would undoubtedly be his friend Mr. Bowie; and any other Association or organisation which might aspire to do similar work for their churches must find a secretary as able, business-like, and broad-minded as he. The year had been signalised by a noble gift, to which a speaker earlier in the day had referred as coming from Liverpool. But that was a mistake, and he asked them to refrain from trying to guess the unguessable. It was neither very courteous to their unknown friend nor very kind to the other excellent friends of the Association, of whom one after another it was whispered quite confidently that they were the anonymous donor. The work they could now do was very large, and he hoped it would be very beneficent. He had every reason to believe that the gift would be continued in its noble proportion so long as the life of their friend was spared, but distinctly on condition that the other £2,000 was subscribed. If, in any case, the list fell even a few shillings below that amount, he believed the £1,000 would absolutely disappear. He had been greatly impressed by the liberality of policy which, not apparently by any effort, but by the nature of the men, characterised the Committee of that Association. A great institution necessarily attracted some shafts of criticism. All that the friends of the Unitarian Association had to ask was that their critics should approach them with fair and open minds and be quite sure of their facts. He had great pleasure in moving that resolution.

* From Matthew Arnold's "Self-Dependence."

The Rev. C. J. STREET, seconding, said that during the last twenty years and especially during Mr. Bowie's secretaryship, the Association had made marvellous strides of advance, and that year's report was the best they had ever had. The way in which the fresh income of £3,000 had been secured was an indication of what could be done when they had the will. During the year, £2,200 had been spent in grants to churches. If any other association were to come in to do that work, the money could be equally well spent in other ways. He congratulated the committee on the success of the revised Essex Hall Hymnal, and emphasised the appeal for more self-denying men with missionary zeal to enter into the fields that were white unto harvest. As to that missionary work, the B. and F. U. A. held the field, and commanded the general confidence of the churches. Where would the churches be to-day, if it had not been for the Association —both the churches of old Presbyterian foundation and the new churches which had been established through their instrumentality? The Association was trusted because of the conviction that they stood for great principles of truth, which they desired to promote in the minds and lives of men. He was ready to fight for freedom, and would cherish the freedom of their churches, but there was something greater still. Freedom gave the opportunity; their work was to declare the truth. Let there be no misunderstanding or misrepresentation of that Association. To say that the Association kept its hands on the reins of authority was not true with regard to the life of their churches. It never attempted to control the churches to which grants were made. It acted, where possible, through the local Associations, which were for the most part representative of the churches. All they asked was whether good work was being done, and their grants would be helpful. The Association never insisted on the Unitarian name being taken by churches that were helped, and they always put the broadest interpretation on that name. They all loved and honoured that name, because of what it stood for, and as individuals, at any rate, would put it in the forefront. Their present duty, it seemed to him, was to recognise that the name was given them, whether they liked it or not; that is what people would call them, and they must make it stand for the greatest dignity of which they could conceive. Let them take the spirit of the sermon of that morning, and make that their Unitarianism, and God would grant His blessing.

The resolution having been unanimously passed, a resolution giving leave to enlarge the number of the committee from 20 to 25 members, if desired, was passed, on the motion of the President, seconded by Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

Mr. James Beard then moved :—

That the best thanks of this meeting be given to the President, the Treasurer, and the Committee, for their valuable services during the past year, and that the following be the respective appointments for the present year :—President, William Arthur Sharpe, Esq. Treasurer, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold. Committee, Mr. J. Barlow, M.D., Mr. G. W. Brown, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. Edwin Clephan, J.P., Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., Rev. James Harwood, B.A., Miss Helen Brooke Herford, Mr. Herbert B. Lawford, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Rev. F. W. Stanley, Miss Tagart, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Mr. S. S. Tayler. Trustees: Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., Auditors: Mr. Sydney Martineau, Mr. Ronald Bartram, Mr. Harold Wade. Council (see list in Annual Report, pp. 33-4).

Speaking of their gratitude to the President, he said that to Mr. Armstrong the expression of high ideals in noble language had been as the very breath of life, and during his year of office the chair of the Association had been resonant of high ideals. They asked a great deal of their president and a great variety of things. There was great need for knowledge of individual churches and members of churches, and judgment and tact in dealing with them, and in dealing with various questions, sometimes difficult, that arose, and in all these their President had never been lacking. They thanked him warmly and cordially for the wisdom, tact, and discretion with which he had guided the counsels of the Association. It seemed that only ministers could really open the pockets of their laymen. He recalled what their dear friend Brooke Herford had done, when he came back from America, to double the income of the Association, and Mr. Armstrong's year of office had been signalised by the splendid new addition to their resources. It was a great opportunity for increased work, and they were grateful for it. It was difficult to assign the exact place in nature of the President of their Association, but he took it to be something half way between a motor-car and an archangel, with the good qualities and powers of both. In welcoming Mr. Sharpe to the office, which he did with the utmost cordiality, he congratulated him on the opportunity of exercising such varied powers to meet their varied needs. He concluded with words of warm appreciation of the services of the treasurer and committee.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE seconded, and added his word of welcome to the new President, who bore a name honoured in the fellowship of their churches, and who was honoured also for his own good work. He welcomed the Revs. C. Hargrove and H. Gow as new members of the committee, and expressed the great regret with which they missed the name of Mr. Frederick Nettlefold from the list. In his retirement, Mr. Nettlefold had the respect and affection of them all.

The PRESIDENT and PRESIDENT-ELECT having acknowledged the vote, the following resolution was moved from the chair and seconded by Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. :—

That the hearty welcome of this meeting be given to the representatives of the following affiliated and kindred societies :—East Cheshire Union, Rev. W. Harrison; Eastern Union, Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A.; Irish Non-subscribing Association, Rev. J. Kennedy; Liverpool District Association, Rev. H. D. Roberts; London District Unitarian Society, Mr. David Martineau; London and S.E.C. Provincial Assembly, Rev. F. K. Freeston; Manchester District Association, Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson; Midland Christian Union, Rev. A. A. Charlesworth; North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association, Rev. J. Channing Pollard.; North and East Lancashire Mission, Rev. J. J. Wright; North Midland Association, Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas; Northumberland and Durham Association, Rev. W. H. Lambelle; Scottish Unitarian Association, Dr. J. Barlow; South Wales Unitarian Association, Rev. David Evans; South-East Wales Unitarian Society, Rev. T. J. Jenkins; Southern Unitarian Association, Mr. F. Pinnock; Western Union, Rev. Walter Lloyd; Yorkshire Unitarian Union, Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A.

This was acknowledged by Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, of the Manchester District Association, the Rev. J. Kennedy, representing Ireland, and the Rev. David Evans, South Wales.

Mr. ROBINSON referred with pleasure to the fact that the Association would hold its autumn meeting this year in Manchester, and spoke of the very cordial relations which subsisted between the district associations and the central body. He thought the scope of the district associations should be widened until the whole country was covered.

The Rev. J. KENNEDY spoke of the sufficiency of Scripture and the right of private judgment as the foundation principle of their Irish Association, and expressed the pleasure with which he had found that the importance of the study of the Bible was being emphasised amongst them. Scholars must interpret the Bible, and yet it must remain their foundation, for it was the record of the religious experience of the most religious race of the world.

The Rev. D. EVANS acknowledged the great indebtedness of the Welsh Churches to the Association. In Calvinistic Wales they were often made to feel their loneliness, and it was a source of great encouragement to feel that they were connected with such a body as that.

The Presidentthen moved :—

That this meeting extends its warmest welcome to the Representatives of Liberal Religious Thought from abroad; and conveys an expression of its gratitude, esteem, and goodwill to those who, in all lands, are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty.

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Foreign Correspondents of the Association in America, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Cape Colony, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Iceland, India, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Sweden, and Switzerland.

"I reach out hands of sympathy," he said, "to the friends in all those distant quarters of the world. I have been profoundly impressed, in some cases by correspondence, in others by personal contact, with the depth, breadth, and earnestness of Unitarian sentiment which prevails through large portions of the world." It was impossible, he added, in the brief time available, to speak to that resolution as it deserved. Their friends must imagine all the love and sympathy they felt towards all the different groups represented by those names.

The Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, in seconding the resolution, said that he held in his hand a large number of letters of greeting, which it was impossible for him to read (the list is given above), but he must mention those representatives who were present in person, and whom they were delighted to welcome :—America : Dr. J. H. and Mrs. Crooker (Ann Arbor, Mich.), Mr. A. E. and Mrs. Lang (Toledo, Ohio) ; Denmark : Miss M. B. Westenholz ; Belgium : Rev. James Hocart ; New Zealand : Miss Ella Macky ; India : Mr. V. R. Shinde and Mr. B. N. Sasmal ; Japan : Mr. Z. Toyosaki. As they thought of their friends in other parts of the world it was instructive to note how they were all doing the same work, under various names, and with the most various ecclesiastical relations. It enlarged their outlook, and set some of their burning questions at home in a new light. It showed how little the dispute as to names had to do with the essential things.

Mrs. CROOKER acknowledged the welcome with much feeling, saying what a delight it was to them to receive the beautiful hospitality of English homes and of the church homes. They would always remember those happy hours, and, whether they were able to come over again or not, would each year celebrate with them that anniversary.

The PRESIDENT moved, and Mr. A. J. MUNDELLA seconded the following resolution, "Wales" being added after "England," in the suggestion of Dr. Griffiths :—

That this meeting earnestly protests against the people of England being required by law to pay rates to be applied to the maintenance of denominational schools which are not under complete public control, and in the payment of salaries of teachers who, while being paid wholly out of public money, are subject to religious tests.

Mr. MUNDELLA said the resolution was very simple and moderate. It was a protest against the denominational system in England. He would gladly have gone further, and protested against the application of taxes also to denominational institutions. He objected to denominational schools under public, almost as much as under private, control. And, as to tests for teachers, he would extend the protest to scholars and pupils in training colleges, and to managers of public institutions. Of a great many public elementary schools, only those could be managers now who had been for three years communicants in the Church of England, which excluded, not only all Nonconformists, but the great bulk of Churchmen. The resolution touched a great crisis and raised a great question, whether education was to be under public control in the interests of the people, or under clerical control in the interests of a sect. Almost the whole country was protesting, and it was right that they should do their part.

Mr. J. C. WARREN recorded his protest against the resolution, on the ground that the Act was an honest effort to deal with an extremely difficult question, and made towards improvement. Because there were certain blots, it ought not to be altogether condemned. If they had been consistent in the past, they would have supported nothing but absolutely secular education. They had not done so, and the present protest he thought was largely due to party reasons.

The resolution was passed with two dissentients.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE moved, and Mr. J. BREDALL seconded :—

Considering that according to the Majority Report of the Royal Commission, "it is undeniable that a gigantic evil remains to be remedied, and hardly any sacrifice would be too great which would result in a marked diminution of the national degradation" due to intemperance, this meeting protests against any attempt to limit the discretion of magistrates in dealing with publicans' licences, and while of opinion that it is desirable that licensees deprived of their living without any misconduct on their part should receive compensation from members of their own trade, it protests against such compensation being in any way charged on or insured by national or local taxation, as unjust and inevitably tending both to restrict the suppression of licences in the interest of the public, and to confer a continuous or vested interest in licences which are expressly granted for the year only.

Mr. HARGROVE pointed out that for hundreds of years the trade had been under strict control, and to interfere with the discretion of the magistrates would introduce a dangerous principle. It was not a sectional protest he was urging, it was on behalf of all who believed in temperance.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

A cordial vote of thanks to Dr. Crooker, preacher of the anniversary sermon, to the Little Portland-street congregation, and to London friends for their hospitality, was moved from the chair, and seconded by the Rev. J. MacDowell.

The Rev. J. H. CROOKER, in acknowledging the vote, said that he had felt the invitation to be their preacher on that occasion as the greatest honour. It came as a surprise and delight, for he had never expected to stand where James Martineau had stood, and others of their great saints and seers. He thanked them for the patient hearing they gave him. It was good to be there, and to find them singing the hymns of his people and singing the English hymns they on their side sang. He also spoke of his great happiness in seeing once more his dear friend Brooke Herford, who, with Robert Collyer and Mr. Sunderland, had welcomed him into the Unitarian ministry. He thanked them again for the honour they had done him, which would remain one of the choicest memories of his life.

The meeting then terminated.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

After an interval for tea, a public meeting was held in Essex Hall, the PRESIDENT in the chair. The meeting had been preceded by an organ recital by Mr. John Harrison, and in opening the proceedings the PRESIDENT said that they were first to have the pleasure of receiving the greetings of two friends from the distant lands of India and Japan.

Mr. V. R. SHINDE, B.A., offered "Greetings from the Brahmos of India," and began by remarking upon the unique fact in the history of religious followship that the Brahmos of India and Unitarians of England, starting from different points of historical development, were marching hand in hand towards one goal. The simple fact that a Hindoo student was invited to prepare in a Unitarian college in England for work in India was significant. It was a fitting occasion for him to express his deep gratitude for the opportunity of having been in England, and at Manchester College, an institution singularly devoted to truth, to liberty and religion. While there the authorities had never inquired what he believed, or did not believe. He would ever remember how disinterestedly they ministered to him, mind and heart and soul, by their expositions in the chair and exhortations in the pulpit, and above all and beneath all, by their personal purity and personal inspirations. Thus they gave without condition and without desire for return. But he did not confine himself to the College, but went about the country, and everywhere he found a warm welcome. And now he would go back to India, and tell his brothers that the prophecy of Keshub Chunder Sen was being fulfilled, that the future religion of the world would be the common religion of all nations, though each with an indigenous growth. As to their work in the West of India to which he was returning, it was yet in a pioneer stage. Able and zealous preachers came occasionally from Bengal, from the central movement in Calcutta, but for the most part they had to depend on their own slender resources. Therefore it was a great encouragement when the B. & F.U.A. enabled some of their men to come to study in England, and he was glad that his successor was also to be from Bombay. They did not know any distinctions between clergymen and laymen. All the distinction they made was between the man who devoted the whole, and the man who devoted part of his time to the work. Their only hope was in the goodness of their cause ; their only help was divine Providence. The failure of orthodox Christian missions in India made them all the more thankful for the wise methods of the work of that Association. His last word for the meeting was to thank them for what they had done on his own personal behalf, and on behalf of all his brothers in that distant land.

Mr. Z. TOYOSAKI also offered "greetings from the Unitarians of Japan," observing that he was the first Japanese Unitarian who had studied in England with the special view of joining the Unitarian movement of the future. Without the help of this Association he could not have done so. Perhaps they might know that the Unitarian movement in Japan was started some twelve years ago. The relations between Japan and America, owing to the American Unitarian Association, had been direct and intimate. By their offering him special help at Oxford, he hoped a new bond of friendship had been made between England and Japan. Moreover, he was delighted to learn they were willing to have more Japanese students at Oxford, and he hoped their new relationship would be more and more confirmed. He had always heard that religion should be the great agency in bringing together all nations for the common good. The world was progressing towards the higher ideas. He was delighted to learn they were contemplating a great enlargement of the work of this Association which covered the whole earth by a cosmopolitan spirit of enterprise. Japan was now waking up from the superstition of former days. It was true that orthodox Christianity had made great progress, but it was a fact that educated and thoughtful Japanese were becoming dissatisfied with the teaching of orthodox Christianity. It was Unitarianism that was winning the hearts of the Japanese people. Unitarianism was acceptable to the Japanese people because it emphasises the infinite value of the human soul; because it taught that God was the Inspirer of every soul. It was the great duty of the Japanese, whose nation was young and had much to do in the direction of building up the country, to stem the wave of materialism. It was a great joy to him to offer the most sincere and hearty greetings of the Japanese Unitarians, as fellow-labourers in a common field for a common cause.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The PRESIDENT then delivered his address, and, after a few introductory words, spoke as follows:—

If we look back over the seventy-eight years since the British and Foreign Unitarian Association came into being, and the immediately preceding decades, we recognise that modern Unitarianism began with a refusal to import, on ecclesiastical authority, a plurality of persons into the conception of God, or a plurality of natures into the conception of Jesus Christ. This refusal was as yet coincident with the acceptance of many conceptions and doctrines common to the Christianity of the day which have since fallen away from the Unitarian mind. But in itself, and as far as it went, this refusal was an instinctive effort towards simplicity of conception on the highest themes of human contemplation, and towards realisation of the all-embracing principle of oneness in the universe. As far as it went, therefore, and however unconsciously, the Unitarian thought of a hundred years ago was, in its own field, a preparation for, and anticipation of, the characteristic thought of the middle of the nineteenth century, the thought which we associate with such names as those of Joule, of Grove, and, indeed, of Darwin and Spencer, the idea of the organic unity of all that is.

But Unitarian scholars, teachers, and preachers, having once started on this path, could not long rest satisfied merely with unifying God with Himself, and Jesus with our common human nature; but the same imperious instinct flowed into their conceptions in many other fields. The dividing fence separating the Bible from the rest of the world's literature, for example, gradually fell away. The sacred Scripture became a purely human product. Its inspiration became no longer a unique and abnormal phenomenon, still less a quality maintained at an exact level of uniformity from the story of Eden to the vision of Patmos. The Bible took its place as the loftiest tableland, indeed, in the vast area of human letters, sweeping upwards, here and there, to altitudes that seemed to touch the very heavens, but always with its valleys of communication with other fields, and unbuttressed by any sheer precipices of demarcation. Inspiration was a normal gift of God to the souls that loved Him of every race and clime, though breaking into dazzling brilliancy in an Isaiah, in a Paul, supremely in Jesus of Nazareth. Nor could the phenomena of the physical world any longer be severed into the normal and the abnormal, the natural and the supernatural. All were natural and all were supernatural alike. And so, too, miracle was gradually erased, not, indeed, by the sinking down of the sublime to the level of the commonplace, but by the lifting up of the whole plain to the height of the sublime. If you sample the publications of this Association for three-quarters of a century, you will find this movement going forward steadily from first to last.

Unitarianism, then, on its theological or philosophical side, has become in its essence a conception in vital unison and sympathy with the conception which was the most conspicuous thought-product of the nineteenth century, as against all such modes of doctrine as tend to hold theology aloof from the methods of thought applied to the universe generally by the mind of the time. As a system of doctrine it is essentially undefinable, refusing to sacrifice its freedom of development and modification in order to fit in to the terms of any definition. There have now and then, indeed, stood forth in its ranks individual men of the dogmatic type of mind. But leaders have always been forthcoming to resist any and every attempt at authoritative definition; and their spirit, and not the spirit of the dogmatists, has always been the spirit of the rank and file of this Association and of the Unitarian people generally; and every effort to establish definitions has uniformly failed. Thus the "ism," Unitarianism, has been essentially a method, a way of approaching theological problems, rather than a particular theology. It has never closed up. It has never had, and could never have, articles or creeds, for such articles would themselves have been the destruction of its vital and essential spirit, which has more and more lain in openness of approach to all problems critical, philosophical, and theological. So far as the word "Unitarianism" means a theology at all, it means a theology by nature progressive and always undergoing modification, never fixed, always on the contrary in flux.

Unitarianism, then, having progressive modification as its essential nature, necessarily finds itself hostile to all theological compulsion, to all intellectual suppression or oppression in any Church, congregation, or society whatever, and friendly to all reverent freedom, wherever exercised, and expressing itself in whatever language. Moreover, having no theological scheme of salvation to maintain, but believing that the human soul obeys the will of God most nearly when it most faithfully follows the leading of His Spirit in the search for truth, it has no interest in pressing this or that theological scheme on churches or communities by any other mode than friendly suasion or purely spiritual appeal; no interest in suppressing this or that line of thought by any social, pecuniary, or other illegitimate and irrelevant pressure. It is entirely free from the temptation which must present itself to the representatives of any theology which holds salvation to be only by sacrament or by creed, to drive, squeeze, or push men into agreement, a temptation which often makes the earnestness of conviction and the genuine love of souls the very measure of the violence, tyranny, and cruelty of the suppressive or oppressive energies put forth.

Thus then I see in Unitarian Christianity a form of Christian faith which stands unique in its attitude to the problem of theological freedom. Other theologies may have learned, as the centuries have worn away, the folly and futility, nay, the wickedness and crime, of religious persecution. But with them the tolerance can only get a footing in competition or compromise with the theology. Of Unitarian Christianity alone is it true that the vital principle of the theology carries with it tolerance as its necessary corollary, and that it can only live in an atmosphere charged with the spirit of liberty. The Calvinist or the Roman Catholic may take on an ethical culture which makes the persecution which is the logical issue of his creed abhorrent to him, and leads him to let his creed go by the board rather than offend against the canons of modern civilisation. It is, I think, given only to the Unitarian Christian, and those in essential harmony with him, to feel that it is solely in an atmosphere of freedom that his convictions can live and spread, and put forth seed and flower in the community around him.

But now let us turn the problem round. I have contended that Unitarian Christianity necessarily makes for, and is impassioned by, the love of religious freedom. Now, reversing the question, how does religious freedom itself stand towards Unitarian Christianity? We, I take it, are members of a group of Churches theologically free, whose boast and glory is that neither minister nor member has ever been required to put his hand or shape his lips to compulsory formula or confession of faith. And we are very jealous for this our perfect liberty. Any society or organisation which should attempt to curtail it or cut it off would rouse an energy of resentment and resistance which would sweep all before it. Many of us probably are even more deeply stirred in our inmost being by the thought of this our freedom of thought and utterance and worship, than by our Unitarian theology itself. What, then, is the relation of this magnificent principle of our Churches to the Unitarian Christianity which so many of us avow?

Why, it is manifest that it shows itself in an inveterate tendency to elaborate as its essential product a Unitarian theology. In perfect faithfulness we hold back our Churches from any utterance of official creed or formula. We inculcate the principle of freedom continually, eagerly, with ardour, with genuine passion. And, lo! nevertheless, nay, all the more, everywhere these Churches produce Unitarians and Unitarianism, teem with the Unitarian type of Christianity. All the orthodox Churches know it. They all know that the relaxation of doctrinal discipline means the upspringing of Unitarian thinking. It is to keep Unitarianism out that they all hold on to their subscriptions and articles, confessions and trust deeds, synods and assemblies, bound and pledged, again and again, despite all the restless protestation of the time-spirit. They know that freedom in the Churches spells Unitarianism. Why then do we ourselves alone, in all the Christian world, refuse to face the fact? Why do we alone shrink back from confessing the fact that ecclesiastical freedom makes Unitarianism, that our Churches are and must be filled with Unitarians, that however loyally we hold our Churches, pew and pulpit, unpledged and free, by the very fact and essence of that freedom the prevailing product is and will be that type of religious thought and feeling which goes by the decried but honourable name of Unitarian Christianity.

The fact is that a free religious community, though individual members may or may not be led to lay stress on the unipersonality of God or on the unity of nature of Christ, necessarily verges towards the Unitarian type of religion, that its mind is informed and vitalised by that same tendency towards unification which is the life and breath of a Unitarian theology.

There is, then, I am persuaded, an inveterate and organic mutual attraction and sympathy between these two things, Unitarianism and ecclesiastical freedom. They are not the same thing, it is true, and each has its own spring of life. But they have an unfailing tendency to coalesce. The one for ever breeds the other. It is right and proper that we should logically distinguish between them, but all nervous alarms lest the one should injure or impair the other are beside the mark. Each finds in the other its natural friend and ally. They are of one spirit, and they are bred of the same genealogy. It is not wise to disown relationship between them. The more ungrudgingly we recognise their kinship, the stronger and better will our position be, for the continual effort to hold aloof the two interests, each in its own sphere so dear to most of us who are gathered here to-day, is necessarily a source of continuous weakness, a fighting with shadows when there is practical work to be done, a tilting at windmills while the hosts of spiritual darkness confront us on the plain.

If now we turn to the constitution and history of the Association which completes to-day its seventy-eighth official year, we come upon startling evidence that our fathers instinctively recognised that same strain in Unitarian Christianity on which I have dwelt, distinguishing it from all the ecclesiastical creeds. We are accustomed somewhat loosely and carelessly to speak of our Society as a doctrinal Association. Yet that is, in fact, quite an inaccurate description. If this Association had been founded primarily with the view of maintaining a particular fixed theological doctrine, common sense would have suggested some definition or other—however broad—of the doctrine which it was founded to maintain. The constitution, however, of the Association is absolutely destitute of any such definition, statement, or description. It refers to no doctrine whatever as such. It insists neither on the unipersonality of God, nor on the unmixed human nature of Christ. On the contrary, in the very first draft of the Rules drawn in 1825, Rule I. reads: "That a general society be formed for the promotion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity at home and abroad," while Rule II. declares the name. To this day, moreover, the same undogmatic statement of purpose stands at the head of our constitution. The second Rule, under the revised code of 1898, declares that it is "the diffusion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity" that the Association exists to promote.

Our fathers felt then, even as we also feel, that there was something prior to doctrine, something still dearer, something even more momentous—namely, certain principles—principles vital, life-giving, broad, tolerant, free, progressive, which they knew not how better to describe than as "the principles of Unitarian Christianity"; the principles which had underlain that gradual movement of dogmatic emancipation from which modern Unitarianism had been evolved; principles with which they felt, as we feel, the future hope of religion itself was bound up; principles of bold and undaunted thinking, of frank and uncompromising utterance, of fellowship transcending dogmatic limitations; principles of respect for every man's private conscience; principles of a world-wide charity and philanthropy. They were doubtless aware that there were individuals outside their ranks who cherished such principles as truly as they. But these were the principles that had been and were peculiarly characteristic of Unitarian Christianity, and they knew not in what other quarter to look for an ecclesiastical connection, a group of Christian churches, who found in these principles the breath of their nostrils, the only air in which they could breathe and thrive. They knew not where else to look in that day when they created our Association; nor, I confess, do I know where else to look to-day.

This Association, then, is built up, not on a definite doctrine, but on certain principles—those, namely, which have characterised Unitarian Christianity.

Doubtless Robert Aspland and Mr. Rutt, Mr. John Christie and Mr. Thomas Gibson (noble founders) felt deep interest in the specific Unitarian controversy, and unsheathed their swords as occasion came, as fourteen years later did James Martineau and John Hamilton Thom in Liverpool, as do some of us amid the ever shifting conditions of the controversy, with feebler weapons, even now. But their concern in this Association was not permanently to fix a dogma on the minds of the people, but to infuse and invigorate a set of principles which to them seemed well described as "the principles of Unitarian Christianity."

At any rate, so they laid the foundations and so they built the temple. And if ever the doctrine and the principles were to come into collision, this Association, by its fundamental constitution, would be bound by the principles, and have to stand by them or betray its trust. The consciousness of this fundamental fact reveals itself again and again in the annals of the Society; and if ever some brother has shown himself so zealous for the doctrines that he has invited the members to action impairing the principles, he has been promptly brought to book, and the Association has been firmly held upon its proper path. The Association never has brought and never could bring doctrinal pressure to bear upon any church or churches. Such action would not only be a violation of the principles on which it is built up, but it would be contrary to the spirit which has ever prevailed among its counsellors. I am convinced that suspicions to the contrary are absolutely destitute of all foundation; most of all in these latest years, when the principle of doctrinal freedom in our churches has come to articulate self-consciousness with unprecedented distinctness.

Whether it be or be not a convenient arrangement that this Association should listen to the appeal of churches that come to it soliciting financial aid is proper matter for unbiassed deliberation. But this at least is certain, that its response to such appeal can never endanger the freedom of any church, a freedom for which, by its tradition, its history, its fundamental and enduring principle, it is at least as jealous as any individual whatsoever in the Free Catholic Churches of Great Britain.

Miss CATHERINE GITTINS spoke on "The work which women might do for liberal religion." It was because they were all one company, travelling the same road, surrounded by the same mysteries, confronted by the same problems, nearing the same goal, and hoping for the same gift, that it behoved them to consider each component part in order to promote the interest of the whole movement. She considered it a privilege to be allowed to represent her fellow women, and to try and set forth the ways in which they might help on the cause. Holy memories of individual women in the past came to their minds. There were many women, who, a century ago, by their lives, character, and the conscientious use of the talents entrusted to them, did much in their communities. Some of these women had the gift of poetic utterance, and she recalled the memory of Mrs. Barbauld and Sarah Flower Adams, who wrote the hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee. They rejoiced to have among them now many women of wide culture and literary skill, which they devoted to their cause; she thought of one revered friend of many of them, Miss Frances Power Cobbe, from whom, long ago, she heard words of benediction in an address given in a Friends' Meeting House in Birmingham, on the work women might do. Miss Cobbe had then expressed her thankfulness that women were beginning to take a larger share in bettering things outside their own homes. She was the first to touch the question of what women might do for religion. For all work done conscientiously was a witness to Christ's spirit, whether in the care of the young, of the aged, comforting the poor, helping the sick, uplifting the fallen. They were glad to know that in many of these ways their women take their full share side by side with the men. As to the special work of uplifting, of which Mr. Carpenter had spoken in his Conference sermon at Liverpool, she felt that what he said was just. At the same time, they must remember that hitherto those engaged in such work had regarded a special form of evangelical belief as essential, but now a broader spirit was being manifested, as she herself had found, and she asked them to consider what they might do in that direction. It was, they all recognised, individual work, and work which only women could do. By giving themselves to that work, with the wisdom of a large charity, they would do much to advance the cause of a true and liberal religion. As to religion in the home, she would add a plea for simplicity of living as the right atmosphere for high thinking and for a true appreciation of all that was best in literature, which also should do much for liberal religion. The wise mother would not avoid serious speech with her children. Coming to the question of what women could do for the churches, she was reminded that unmarried women had been described as the cement of society, keeping the parts from falling into a shapeless ruin. But women, married or unmarried, might be looked upon in that light with regard to their churches and institutions. She thought enough was not made of the sisterly feeling among all women working in the same church. It was only here and there they found the women friendly societies, which gave to women, young and old, useful work and friendly intercourse. All their churches would be the better for such among their woman members. For such would enable them to reach out a kindly hand of fellowship to the many weary working sisters who live in the neighbourhood of their town and city churches. The missionary spirit needed cultivating among their churches, and this would provide the opportunity. When she was asked what women might do to rouse the flagging energies of their churches she could only answer it was impossible to say so long as the smallest share in management was denied them. It was much the same as with the new education authorities. They might pay their little moneys and sit on subordinate committees, but the final appeal must be to the men. And the reason given was that the men had the longer purse and understood business. Surely there was no wonder things were wrong with their churches when they rested upon such a material basis as this. But a change was coming over them, and some of their leading churches were appointing women members on their councils. She wished to speak as one of many women who believed in the coming of the Kingdom of God on earth, beyond and outside the churches. The one main note of the recent Conference sounded by the President was the call to the churches to grapple with the social problem of their time. It seemed as if Unitarians were waking up to the methods to be adopted. How was it that long ago their chapels were so identified with the cause of civil and religious liberty? They were not only ready to speak with united voice, but to suffer for the cause—ministers and laymen alike—even to die for it. The firm attitude of religious bodies brought about reform. They were told that the aim of their churches was to improve the individual character of their members. God was calling them to the human question. They wanted something to take them out of their self-satisfaction, and surely it was most inspiring to work together for that great purpose of redeeming the common life of the people.

The Rev. CHAS. HARGROVE, M.A., spoke on "Our Cause: Is it worth supporting?" Commencing with the two questions: "Is Unitarianism played out?" and "What did Unitarianism stand for?" He said it stood in the past for a protest against the terrible old doctrines of depravity and hell, and the scheme of salvation which went with those doctrines. And there was still need of that protest. He thankfully allowed that in many churches, and by many eminent men these doctrines were not only not taught but were absolutely denied. Yet they could not say therefore that there was no need for a religious society which protested against them. It was true that there were individuals in every Church—perhaps, excepting the Roman Church — who denied those doctrines, but there was no Church which sanctioned those denials, no Church which, as a Church, had denied them, no Church which had disowned them. For that reason there was need for a religious society which emphatically protested against those doctrines and absolutely denied them. The Unitarian cause was worth supporting on that account alone. Unitarianism stood for human reason and divine religion, for the freest, fullest, most fearless exercise of reason as not only the right but the duty of every man. It stood for religion as entirely compatible with reason, not for this or that form of religion, but that underlying recognition of the supernatural which was common to all forms of religion, however much it might be obscured in many of them. The greatest argument for the truth of Unitarianism was, as the President had said, that, given freedom, they would arrive at the same results. They had another reason for supporting the Unitarian cause, in that it stood emphatically and professedly for salvation. If any religion plucked the sinner out of his evil ways, set up the fallen, enlightened those in darkness and brought peace to the troubled soul, that religion was so far true and good. Unitarians preached to men that they should repent of their inhumanities, their follies, their low views of life, their mean ambitions. They worked for the clearing of slums, for the suppression of the drink traffic, for the lifting up of the fallen, for the education of the poor. Was not that a cause worth supporting? He ended with an impassioned appeal for loyalty and devotion to the cause.

Dr. C. HERBERT SMITH, speaking on "applied religion," said that from the standpoint of the younger Unitarians he felt that their leaders were making a great mistake in taking up too frequently a tone of pessimism with regard to their cause. The average Unitarian—by which he meant the younger men—did not believe that. They believed they had a good cause, and that, having a good cause, they were bound to be triumphant in the long run. Those who believed in the creed of Unitarianism—that was, in a religion without a creed—must put their shoulders to the wheel. There never was a time when it was more necessary for all friends of progress to stand shoulder to shoulder and resist the tide of reaction. For instance, who would have thought, twenty years ago, that education would have stood in the position that it did to-day. The principles which, twenty years ago, seemed to have been established once and for all, had been ruthlessly swept away. And what had the Unitarian body been doing in the matter? He did not profess to know. That was the sort of work he put under the head of applied religion. If Unitarianism was to do any good, it must be brought into every-day life. The one great danger in which Unitarianism stood at present was this: they were much too fond of looking backwards and singing pæans over the work already done. But young men hoped to have a future. However glorious the past might be, they hoped to have a more glorious future. In the past the finest work a religious body could do was to fight the great battle of religious freedom—to secure the right of the individual to think out even great religious questions for himself, and act for himself. The twentieth century was not going to fight that battle again. The great battles of commerce, the battles between nation and nation, and, if he might say so, the battles between religions were going to be fought out on different lines from those on which they would have been fought 50 or 100 years ago, and the great mistake was that they were ignoring that fact. If Unitarianism was to take its proper par- in the future they would have to recogt nise this fact—that organisation in some shape or form would be absolutely necessary for existence. What he argued for was not creed as a basis of organisation. He wanted nothing dogmatic, but he did want Unitarians to feel that they were in sympathy with one another, and were connected in some practical way. Small communities scattered about the country needed support in every possible way. They wanted to be made to feel that they were members not only of a particular congregation but of a whole Unitarian body. He ventured to say that whatever the past of Unitarianism had been, the future was likely to be a great deal more glorious. He believed that at this period of English history there was an opportunity for a body such as theirs, which was free from all creeds, to do such a work as had never been offered to any religious body in the past. In Unitarianism they had the one religion which was in accord with the spirit of the times, absolutely fearless, and willing to accept any scientific discovery. As time went on, it would be more and more the religion, not merely of everyday men and women, but of the men and women who would come forward to lead the great movements of the world. The twentieth century would be one in which was established, not any theological principles, but the real religion of humanity and the real downfall of theological tests which at present bound so many people.

The Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A., spoke on the subject "Lessons Taught by Chas. Booth's Book on Religious Influences in London." Mr. Booth's book, he said, was one which challenged the attention of all the Churches. Mr. Booth and his assistants had attended worship at churches and chapels of all denominations, had interviewed clergymen and ministers, had studied calendars and annual reports, and had made every investigation possible to men trained in that method of investigation for finding out what Christianity in an organised form was doing in London. Mr. Booth did not consider the intellectual side of religion. He did not ask whether a system was true, but what it was doing. A clergyman in a poor district was quoted as saying: "What we want is wholesome pessimism, which sees the worst and is unhappy about the worst." That, however, could not properly be called pessimism, because there was an element of hope behind it. Christian churches of all denominations, Mr. Booth's book showed, only touched a small minority of the people. Neither their worship, their moral teaching, nor their doctrine attracted the great majority of the citizens of London. When the present Bishop of London was working in Bethnal-green, he held weekly "at homes" for working-men, and he found that only 1 in 80 of those men went to church. London was not a Christian town in the sense that Mecca was a Mahommedan place. In Eastern countries religion meant something which enjoined doing certain things which usually were done, and not doing certain things which consequently as a rule were not done. It played a part in the life of the people. In London it was not so. There were, however, three signs of encouragement which Mr. Booth quoted. First, among the working classes there was seen a kind of sublimated trades-unionism which was almost a gospel. Secondly, the life of voluntary poverty seemed the only road to the confidence of people in the slums. Such a life of self-sacrifice took hold of the poor. Thirdly, taking London as a whole, it was the children alone who were responsive. The High Church more than all others had realised that. Unitarians were always saying they could not get the masses, but they could get the children. It was Sunday-school teachers who were needed. There was constant complaint of crowded under-staffed schools and empty over-staffed churches. Then they must recognise the "sublimated trades unionism" referred to, and be careful that the middle classes in which they moved so much did not prejudice them against the working classes. There was an immense field for young unmarried men to live and work in the poorer districts. High Churchmen were doing it to a great extent, and there was nothing in the doctrine or faith of Unitarians which need hinder them from doing as much or more. Upon faithfulness in such work depended in great measure the future of their churches.

The meeting closed with the singing of the Doxology and the Benediction pronounced by the President.

THE DANGER OF TYRANNY.

SIR,—I very much regret that I cannot regard as satisfactory the explanation offered by Mr. Lummis of his grave allegation that the Unitarian Association "has already grasped the reins of Church government," although I observe that he now substitutes the word "hold" for the more active expression "grasp."

Mr. Lummis alleges that the Association "has become the collector of dues and the paymaster to the Free Churches." I submit that the collection of voluntary subscriptions is in no way analogous to the collection of "dues," the latter word implying some kind of obligation or compulsion, and being quite irrelevant to Mr. Lummis's case unless he uses it as importing such obligation or compulsion. I further submit that the Association cannot, with any sort of accuracy, be called "the paymaster to the Free Churches." In the first place, it makes no payment at all to most of them; and, in the second place, there are other associations or trusts making payments to ministers or churches all over the country, notably the Augmentation and the Sustentation Funds, which have quite as much claim to be honoured or dishonoured by being called "paymasters" as the Unitarian Association. Mr. Lummis goes on to state that "certain ecclesiastical funds have been placed under its control." If he will be so good as to state to what particular funds he alludes, it will be easier to weigh the importance of his statement. Our excellent secretary would, I am sure, be the first to disclaim being "the general adviser of our churches," though I believe it to be quite true that very many of us gladly turn to him for counsel on many occasions. I do not think that any new adjustments which Mr. Lummis may seek to bring about will tend to make us less gratefully seek Mr. Bowie's counsel or attach less weight to his opinion or advice.

It is true that the Association publishes a handbook, which many of us find useful. If any friends will produce another more useful still, we shall gladly welcome it. No one is under the least shadow of obligation to buy or use the Essex Hall Year Book. But it would be a rather strenuous kind of freedom that would hinder the Association from publishing a handbook found useful by its members.

Finally, Mr. Lummis declares that "the actual direction of affairs" is in the hands of the Association. The statement, I venture to think, is entirely outside the facts. The Association never meddles with the affairs of any church unless its aid is voluntarily solicited; and even when it yields to the petition for assistance, it abstains from any interference beyond the seeking of such guarantees as trustees are bound to seek when administering public funds.

It seems to me, then, that Mr. Lummis has wholly failed to sustain his allegation that the Association "has already grasped the reins of Church government," and I could wish that he had withdrawn what was, no doubt, originally a somewhat unguarded statement, instead of trying to support it by other statements which will not bear examination. I know well that he would not willingly mislead. But when we are all anxious to understand one another and to find ways of working together harmoniously in the interests of religious truth and freedom, it seems to be of the first importance that we should avoid every distorted representation and be scrupulous not to allow our views to discolour facts.

RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG.

Liverpool, June 1.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., acknowledges with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—The Misses Meyer, £3 3s.; Mrs. Rutt, £1 1s.; Mr. Taylor Heape, £1 1s.; Mrs. Temple, £1 1s.; Miss Short, £1 1s.

ERRATA.—In last week's article on "Emerson in England," in the quotation of Mr. Ireland's account of Emerson's preaching at Edinburgh, for tumid read turgid, and for frequent thoughts read pregnant thoughts.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Godalming.—The spring services at Meadrow were conducted last Sunday, in the morning, by the Rev. Hubert Clark, and in the afternoon and evening by the Rev. Frederick Allen, more than a hundred worshippers being gathered together; and no faces were brighter than those of the children and the young people, amongst whom the minister of this old and hallowed chapel has an inestimable influence with his teaching of religion perfectly tolerant, free from all dogma, and meeting God in the constant call of common love and daily duty.

Guildford.—It will be recalled that some time ago we recorded an exchange of pulpits between the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, and the Rev. G. B. Stallworthy, pastor of the Congregational Church at Hindhead, Haslemere. Such events proclaim the wider view of the true teaching of Christ more welcome to those who hitherto have adhered to a more straitened position. Further, it shows that the broader interpretation is one not intellectual but spiritual, and not exclusive but in the noblest sense comprehensive. On Whit Sunday, Mr. Stallworthy's pulpit was occupied by the Rev. E. S. Lang-Buckland, who conducted the morning, evening, and baptismal services. The pastor of the Congregational Church at Hindhead is one who has proved no sectarian and whose tolerance amounts to magnanimity. Mr. Stallworthy has more than once lectured and conducted the services at the Free Church in Ward-street, Guildford.

Horsham.—The 130th Anniversary services were held on Sunday, when sermons were preached by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, M.A. There were present a good number of friends, including members of the Billingshurst, Brighton and Ditchling congregations. A conference in the afternoon was addressed by the minister of the day, the Revs. J. J. Marten and G. Lansdowne, and Mr. Jas. B. Price from Australia. The Essex Hall hymnal was used for the first time, sixty copies having been presented to the church by Mr. D. Price.

Lye.—On May 24, the Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. F. A. Homer, when there were good congregations afternoon and evening; and the collections amounted to £10 7s. 6d.

Mansfield.—On Saturday, May 23, the Old Meeting House Field Club held its first meeting for the season at Ault Hucknall, when a most interesting historical address was given by the Rev. E. I. Fripp in the ancient church (fully reported in the Mansfield Chronicle of May 29). One of the associations of the church, is that Thomas Hobbes, author of "Leviathan," who died December 4, 1679, is buried there.

Oldham (Presentation).—The services of Mr. Charles Haigh as chapel secretary for a period of sixteen years were recognised on Tuesday evening, May 26, when he was presented with a combined secretaire and bookcase, and copies of a dozen neatly bound oratorios besides. Mr. Wm. Marcroft presided, and the presentations were made by Mr. Hepworth (Vice-President of the Congregation) and Rev. J. A. Pearson, who referred in their own way to the excellent work Mr. Haigh had done. They spoke of the trying times the congregation had gone through twice when it was without a minister, of the unvarying fidelity and regularity of the secretary, and it was pointed out how the membership had increased from 181, in 1887, to 256 in 1902; that while subscriptions had fallen from £189 to £173, the total income had increased from £272, in 1887, to £305 in 1902; that the payments for the new chapel had been completed, the new schools built and paid for, and a balance on the right side obtained. Mr. Haigh had a record of twenty years' work as a Sunday-school teacher, and had been leader of the choir for many years as well. They made their presentations with kindly feeling and respect, and the hope of many years yet to be spent in work together. In acknowledging the gifts, Mr. Haigh spoke of the co-operation of the committee and minister, which had aided him greatly, and expressed the desire that all connected with the work at the Unitarian chapel might continue to prosper.

Pentre: South Wales.—On May 20, the Rev. David Rees lectured to a good audience at the Baptist Chapel, Mardy. This is the third time that the Temperance Committee of the Mardy Free Churches has extended this invitation to Mr. Rees.

Southend.—The fifth anniversary of the foundation of the church was celebrated on Sunday and Monday week. Special services were conducted on the Sunday by Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, and on Monday a well-attended public meeting was held, at which Revs. Frederick Allen, W. Chynoweth Pope, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Miss Marian Pritchard, Mr. Alec. Steel, and Mr. W. T. Davies delivered addresses in support of Unitarian principles. The meeting was full of encouragement for the church.

London Sunday School Society.

The ANNUAL AGGREGATE SERVICE for Teachers and Elder Scholars will be held at ESSEX HALL on Sunday, June 14th, at 3.15 P.M.

The Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, M.A., will conduct the Service.

Friends will be cordially welcomed.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

TO-MORROW is Hospital Sunday in London, and public interest has been quickened by the King, who, with characteristic thoughtfulness, asked that the day might be observed a week earlier at St. Paul's Cathedral, and himself attended with the Queen a special afternoon service. The Bishop of Stepney was the preacher, who, taking Luke xxii. 24 as text, said that the only real title to greatness was in service, and he who served his fellow-men must be moved by a great compassion. Christ had manifested that great truth to the world, and, speaking on Trinity Sunday, the Bishop declared that the power of the Godhead had made its supreme revelation in self-sacrifice for the love of man. "Only God, because He is so great, could thus dare to stoop to death in the fulness of compassion." The assertion that God died we must regard as a monstrosity of "Aberglaube" on the Bishop's part, but may none the less gratefully accept the truth of his plea that the divinest strength of humanity is in compassion and unselfish service of others' needs. Thus the preacher said:—

We may still watch and push and struggle for place, position, or wealth; but all the while we know that our efforts are poor and mean and degrading. Men despise us even when they make way for us. There is nothing great in position unless it is used as a power for wider service; nothing great in wealth unless it is used as an opportunity for helping others. Forgetting this, even if we seem to succeed, we are making the great failure. But let us make an act of self-sacrifice, let us feel the thrill of sympathy that unites us with our fellow-men, and we know that we are raised! Compassion rules by Divine right, and is the one real power all the world over!

The Bishop then spoke directly of the appeal made by the London hospitals:—

On Hospital Sunday our imagination is touched by the thought of the vast tide of pain and suffering which our hospitals are trying with such noble patience and devotion to stem. If one poor sufferer were brought before us there is not one of us who would not do what we could to help. But to-day it is not one poor sufferer, but the 105,000 in-patients and the 1,670,000 out patients in our London hospitals who are, as it were, laid at our door. And to lend if it might be force to their plea, our gracious King and Queen, with the members of the Royal House, have associated themselves with it by their presence, illustrating the true royalty of compassion, proving once again that it needed no proof that here in England "the throne is upholden by mercy,"

The annual deficit of £250,000 from which the hospitals suffered, was, he said, a sign that London, with its great wealth, had not yet reached the height of its opportunity. It would be a grievous thing if their charities could no longer depend on voluntary gifts, but should be obliged to claim the aid of the rates. One more passage from this short but eloquent sermon we will quote:—

The greatness of a nation consists not so much in the number of its people or the extent of its territory, in the mass of its wealth, as in the strength and width and jnstice of its compassion. We are proud of the greatness of the City of London. But its size is a thing to appal, not to uplift, unless it speaks of one body in which the strong and the weak, the rich and the poor, are bound together by the ties of mutual help and common service. Its wealth is a mere golden idol upon feet of merest clay unless it is used as a trust for the public good, an opportunity for the exercise of compassion. Our hospitals stand in our midst as a continual reminder, lest we forget, lest we forget the real greatness of this city.

The collection at the service amounted to £4,300.

The World's Work, in this month's article on "The Work of the Book World," gives the following notice of abook that has special interest for our readers, under the section "Serious Reading."—"Studies in Theology (Dent), an eloquent and scholarly work, every page imbued with things of the spirit, is a statement of the present ethical position of Unitarianism by two thinkers who, since the death of Dr. Martineau, are the foremost exponents of modern Unitarianism. Professor J. Estlin Carpenter contributes seven essays, Mr. P. H. Wicksteed six. All have appeared before, either as separate publications or in periodicals or collections, and there is not one essay, from Mr. Wicksteed's The Religion of Time and the Religion of Eternity, to Professor Carpenter's The Place of Immortality in Religious Belief, but is optimistic and fervently hopeful of the higher destiny of man. Says Professor Carpenter:—

"Our transits through successive spheres of being are but the stages on a path that may sometimes, like the planetary motions, appear retrograde, yet only because it circles higher and higher towards a central holiness and love. In this continuous ascension some fly with sorrowing wing, some plod with slow and halting step. The moral conditions of the life immediately after death cannot be altogether unlike the present, if there be any truth in that maxim of Indian wisdom which affirms that "a man is born into the world which he has made." In any life of spiritual progress there must be inequalities of capacity and achievement, and consequent ministries of helpfulness; and it may well be our cherished trust that those who have been for us guides, teachers, revealers here—parent, or wife, or child, or friend—will fulfil the same divine function for us otherwhere.

"This high and consolatory extract may fittingly close our record of the important books of the month."

MR. CARNEGIE, who has recently offered to bear the expense of building a great Temple of Peace for the housing of the Hague Tribunal, considers that if international politics were as harmonising a force as international education, industry and science, the alarming race for increased weapons of destruction would promptly cease. He told the Iron and Steel Institute in his inaugural address on May 7, which has been published in Engineering, that if the whole subject of international relationships were referred by the parliaments of the world to that Institute, they could readily appoint a committee of distinguished citizens of the various countries, members of the Institute, who would have little difficulty in laying the foundations of international peace and goodwill. His address dealt, further, with the need to establish such relationship among owners, managers, and workpeople of great trading concerns as shall secure the sense of comradeship and community of interest among all engaged in any business enterprise, by profit-sharing and the use of the ideas of all who had ideas to communicate. He gave particulars of the methods adopted to this end by several companies, especially the United States Steel Company, the largest of all industrial corporations, and maintained that the most satisfactory means would be found through practical experience and could not be argued out beforehand. One thing, however, must be secured, that the interest of the ordinary workman in the capital of the company he served must not be subject to the fluctuations of the Stock Exchange, but that his capital must be held in such a way as to be a reliable resource for his old age, and his concentration on his own particular work must not be dissipated by anxious watching of Stock Exchange quotations.

A VACATION term for Biblical study by women is being arranged at Cambridge. Mrs. Creighton, widow of the late Bishop of London, who is to be addressed at Hampton Court Palace, is secretary of the committee, and will gladly give any necessary information. She, and the president, Mrs. Benson, have addressed a letter to the Times, from which we quote the following passages :—

There are many who have little opportunity or leisure to gain the knowledge which alone will enable them to resist the attacks of hasty and one-sided criticism. A three-weeks vacation term has been arranged at Cambridge in order to provide facilities for academic Bible study on the level of honour work in other subjects. It is hoped that such a course of study arranged on a Christian basis and conducted by lecturers chosen, not as representatives of any particular school of doctrine, but as experts in their own subjects, may meet a very widely-felt need.

As at present arranged, the scheme will include courses of four lectures—from Dr. Kirkpatrick on "Old Testament Religion," Professor Swete on "New Testament Christology," Dr. Stanton on "New Testament Times," Dr. Rashdall on "The Philosophy of Religion," Mr. F. C. Burkitt on "The Synoptic Gospels," the Rev. C. F. Burney on "Genesis and Exodus," Dr. Barnes on "Isaiah," Dr. Agar Beet on "The Epistle to the Romans," the Rev. R. H. Kennett on "The History of Israel," as well as single lectures on special subjects.

The terms, including lecture fees, and with residence at Newnham or Girton Colleges, will be £1 17s. 6d.—in lodgings from £1 12s. 6d.—per week.

The annual meeting of the Society for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Protestant Dissenting Ministers was held on Tuesday, May 26, at the Sunday School Union House, 56, Old Bailey, the Rev. Thomas Greenwood being in the chair. The report shows that during the past year 75 aged and infirm ministers have been relieved by the Society, among whom £860 have been distributed.

IT is the angel aim and standard in an act that consecrates it. He who aims for perfection in a trifle is trying to do that trifle holily. This aspiration to do perfectly—is it not religion practicalised? If we use the name of God, is this not God's presence becoming actor in us? No need then of being "great" to share that aspiration and that presence. The humblest man or woman can live splendidly! That is the royal truth that we need to believe, you and I who have no "mission" — no great sphere to move in. The universe is not quite complete without my work well done.—W. C. Gannett.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE most interesting thing in this month's Nineteenth Century and After we have found a brief note at the end by the editor, giving a revised report of Lord Kelvin's recent speech acknowledging a "creating and directing Power which science compels us to accept as an article of belief," and adding some reminiscences of the famous Metaphysical Society. Having mentioned the chief members of that society, including Dr. Martineau (whom Tennyson, says Mr. Knowles, held to be "the greatest among us"), he adds :—

Lord Tennyson himself, who sat so loose to the ordinarily accepted forms of Christianity, formulated in those days his own personal creed, and I reproduce it here in order to set the belief of a King of Poetry alongside that of a Prince of Science. It has already been published in this Review (January, 1893), and runs thus :—"There's a something that watches over us; your individuality endures; that's my faith, and that's all my faith." To cardinals and archbishops Tennyson's creed seemed sadly insufficient, but Martineau said of it, "Yes, God and Immortality—a sufficient basis for religion," and Ward (that most generous of all Ultramontanes) used to declare, "In these days one must be thankful for a Theist."

The Contemporary has a wholesome article on "Habitual Confession for the Young," by a Rugby master, Dr. A. J. Wilson, showing its disastrous effects on the moral character, and another of Miss E. M. Caillard's thoughtful articles, on "The Ethical Individual and Immortality." Sir G. W. Kekewich writes on "The Church and the Education Act," speaking very frankly of the Act as designed "for further educational endowment of the Church of England out of the rates." The conduct of the clerical party in their manipulation of the Bill in Parliament is exposed, and then it is added:—

Hundreds of clergy, thousands of Churchmen, view the proceedings of their Church with grave apprehension and deep regret. Some object to the interference of the County Council: some are conscious that the greed and injustice of the Church must weaken her influence on the people, and they resent the financial propping by the State of the creed which they regard as fully capable of holding the field by its own inherent truth. Among the former class are many admirable clergymen, who have managed schools with energy and justice, and take a profound personal interest in the secular instruction, as well as in the religious knowledge of the children, and who have spent considerable sums of money out of their own pockets on the improvement of the teaching. These men naturally do not appreciate being ousted, as a reward of merit, from the control of the secular instruction, and regard themselves as having been betrayed by the bishops and Convocation. The latter class contains the most progressive and far-sighted of the clergy.

The present state of things, Sir George adds, cannot last. The Church has lost the substance of control over education, and kept the shadow. The sooner that also goes, as in a few years it must, the better will it be for the Church.

The Monthly Review is of unusual interest this month. There is Sir Herbert Maxwell's article on "Animal Intelligence," and an illustrated article on "Who should Emigrate to Canada?" (see also the beautifully illustrated article in Scribner's on a new holiday country in the West), and an article on "The Philosophy of James Martineau," by Mr. Reginald Balfour, which, however, does not go very far, but maintains that between them Hamilton and Martineau "restored the modest empire of natural dualism." The serial story (if story it is to be called), "The Veil of the Temple" sets a number of enlightened people discussing the profoundest questions of life and religion in a very readable, and, at the same time, very capable manner.

The World's Work opens with a full-page portrait of Mr. Choate, the American Ambassador, and has several other most interesting portraits, particularly one of F. C. Gould, as well as an illustrated article in which this inimitable caricaturist (one of the few redeeming features of present-day political life) interviews himself. "The Revival of Irish Linen," "The Reform of our Prisons," and "The Oxford University Press," are samples of the very varied contents of this admirably illustrated review.

BELLINI'S MADONNA.

WHO gazes would for ever gaze,
Sweet mother, on thy Babe and thee;
Calmer of my vexed days!
Pictured tranquillity!

Shelter and shadow thou dost make,
Intangible, but oh! as sweet
As a landscape in a lake,
Or mirage in the heart.

As He the veilèd eyes doth hold
Spellbound to Him, thine eyes hold me,
And draw me to the gold
Redemption on thy knee.

Fair fruit of the Hesperides!
Held to thy heart so near—
Our ancient woe's release.

But the white hand that holds the fruit
Outgleams its golden loveliness,
And its large might makes mute
Life's wayward storm and stress.

Hold me, oh! to thy heart as near
As now thy own Sweet Fruit is held,
Till all life's strife and fear
In my dark heart is quelled.

THE UNITARIAN GOSPEL. *

BY THE REV. J. H. CROOKER, D.D.

"The glorious Gospel of the blessed God."—1 Tim. i. 11.

THIS text is a noble scripture that sets us in a wide horizon under a serene sky. The supreme gospel, or good news, is the discovery that goodness operates at the centre of creation. If we deny this fact, every bright prospect suddenly ends in the darkness of night, and every sweet melody vanishes quickly into eternal silence. But if we plant ourselves firmly upon the eternal goodness, all discords melt into harmony in due time, and every shadow finally lifts, revealing the sun that casts it. The most inspiring glad tiding is the prophecy that gladness is the final goal to which all souls are moving. The most precious thought of God is that which represents Him as distributing, not woes and curses, but blessings to all the children of men; all pains and sorrows are incidents in an education of love. This is our general outlook upon the universe; a courageous faith, an earnest optimism, chastened by pity and fired by moral enthusiasm.

It is from just this point of view that we need to approach and describe the Unitarian Gospel. It is not a finality, but a method of growth, the spirit of a life; a revelation in the process of disclosure. It is not an estate which is selfishly held as a monopoly; it is rather a common possession of spiritual wisdom which we share with the innumerable multitudes of God's children living in all ages and widely scattered at this moment over the whole earth. We are most gladdened by our faith, not when we pride ourselves upon it as a solitary treasure, but when we rejoice in it as a wide sweeping river of the water of life. God blesses us most, not when we think of Him as speaking to us alone, but when we realise that He communes with all. We deny the love of God and approach atheism when we limit His blessings to ourselves. The Unitarian Gospel is not a negation to be described by criticisms of other churches; it is a positive and profound conviction jubilant with trust and hope. We care nothing for the word "Unitarian" as a dogmatic badge or sectarian war-cry; but we cherish above everything else the glorious truths of which it is the symbol, and we gladly put it on the banner under which we march. No other word is associated with a nobler band of saints and seers, and no other word so well describes the scientific discoveries and humanitarian enthusiasms of the time.

The Unitarian Gospel is both an affirmation and an aspiration. We affirm a spiritual interpretation of human nature; an interpretation assumed by democracy, implied by education, approved by science, demonstrated by philanthropy. Our fundamental proposition is the sanctity, dignity, perfectability --- yes, the divinity of the human soul; neither made nor created, but begotten in the image of God. We accept all the facts about man—some very black and melancholy—but the only way to arrive at a divine Fatherhood deserving worship is to start with man as a being worth bringing into life. We trace our inheritance, not down to the clod, but upward to God.

We affirm that God is love. There are ways of the Eternal which we do not understand; there are mysteries which we cannot penetrate; we see in part and we prophesy in part. But there are supreme realities in our knowledge, however limited; sublime certainties in our intuitions, however imperfect. This much we must grant to have any science at all. The only way to account for ourselves is to trace our life back into the realities of the universe. The love in our hearts reveals and demonstrates a love outside ourselves.

We affirm that man is able to live a moral life because he lives in a moral universe. The seeing and knowing together, which is "conscience," is possible because there is a moral law and a spiritual quality in nature that is discoverable. The architect can build the dome of St. Peter's because there are mechanical qualities in the materials with which he works. It is possible for man to create a moral character because principles of morality inhere in the life-materials which he handles. The fact that the ethical outcome of human actions often outruns the human intent of the actors in the drama of life, proves that ethical law underlies and overrules human affairs. The better outcome could not issue were there not a Providence outside ourselves intent on lifting our feeble effort for the good up to the best.

We affirm that nothing can do the work of religion but religion. The fruitfulness of religion reveals the religiousness of the universe. The very excesses of superstition measure the wonderful hold of religion upon life; the very cruelties of misguided piety reveal the transcendent power of the religious sentiment. Religion is native, essential, dominant. The church is created by human need: that which underlies the market, the school, the state —only deeper down and more precious. There can no more be a substitute for religion than for breathing. If we have holiness and all the sanctities and felicities bound up with it, we must plant and nurture the seeds of the religious life. We need not fear the outgrowth of religion. We need to be anxious at only one point: Have we a modern faith and are we wise and active in our methods of religious nurture? The interpretation of human nature necessary as the basis of the laboratory is all that is needed for the foundation of the temple. What undermines the spire of the church will bring down the observatory; and views of life that leave no place for piety provide no room for science or philosophy.

We affirm that the Bible is the literary expression of the religious sentiment native to man. Therefore the only wise use of the Bible is as a means of religious culture; not to impose opinions, but to communicate life. As universal history shows that man is a Bible-making being by nature, it follows that the soul that makes must be superior to the thing made: authority for evermore in the reason that reveals, not in the written word that records, however precious. The religious use of Scripture must give heed to the conclusions of reverent but free and progressive scholarship. Texts are never to be worn as fetters. They are fuel to feed the altar flames of the heart.

We affirm that Jesus was the realisation of human possibility, whose sole ministry is to help us realise our divinity. To keep him within the limit of humanity is to appreciate him most fully and also to inspire our own hearts most effectively. The measure of our discipleship is the likeness of our lives to the essential spirit of his life. Our salvation does not issue from acceptance of his merits, but from obedience to his gospel; it is not the result of what he did for us at the throne of God, but the fruitage of what he accomplishes in our own hearts; it is not belief in him as revealing God's love, but the love which we put into our lives under the inspiration of his life and in obedience to the spirit of God; it is not looking unto the cross for deliverance from the penalty of sin, but the bearing of our crosses that sins and sorrows may vanish from all hearts. As Unitarians we insist that the duty of the Christian Church is not to emphasise the speculations of dogmatists about Jesus, but to apply his gospel to the lives of men, and organise human society in obedience to the Sermon on the Mount.

We affirm the hope of immortality. We ask that men trust their own souls. The immortal hope exists and persists because it has been and is of infinite use in human life. It came into the soul out of the hand of God to help the soul. Its vast utility proves its supreme reality and certainty. The human eye reveals the existence of light, and the organ persists because it is of use. There is a warrant in the environment of birds for wings, or they would not exist. The immortal hope that serves the most precious interests of human life would not be in the breast of man were it not warranted by the nature of things, by the spiritual constitution of the universe. It was born out of human need; it remains because of use in the highest realm of life; its utility demonstrates its basis in divine reality. The steps of assurance are these: I find this hope in my soul. It persists in face of all mere appearances to the contrary. It commands and enriches my life. It is of infinite utility. It fosters the best that is in me. How could it be there unless warranted by the spiritual universe that environs me, unless put there by God Himself? And if God put it there, then it is true, if there be any veracity in the universe. Therefore, we rest our hope of immortality, not on text or marvel, but on the integrity of the universe, the truth and justice of God Himself.

We affirm that destiny is determined by Inner Life. Our personality is the measure of our worth to the world. The spiritual quality of our own life is the source of our permanent blessedness. We plant ourselves firmly upon the teaching of Jesus respecting the kingdom of heaven: purity its condition, growth its method, love its motive, service its expression, reason its guide, character its fruitage. We shall export to the future what we have imported into our hearts and minds.

But the Unitarian Gospel is more than an affirmation, it is an aspiration. It is more than a truth seen, it is a truth lived.

* The Annual Sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, preached in Little Portland-street Chapel, on Wednesday morning, June 3.

It is our aspiration to stand in the watch-tower of discovery and welcome and use every truth that is brought into the field of knowledge. We insist that a growing faith is the strongest faith. We strive to adjust our opinions and our actions to all the facts as they become known. We would keep the note of reality in the church as in the school. He who fails to revise his belief loses his hold on God. He who fails to incorporate new truth into his religious faith is as disloyal to God as he who violates a moral principle. He who shuts the door to discovery so far denies God. He who neglects to utilise and emphasise the spiritual significance and conduct value of the great revelations of modern science not only dishonours God but lessens the influences for good in the world. It is, therefore, our ambition to assist in the progressive organisation of truth in private and public life. We would demonstrate the important fact that there may be perfect freedom in religion without licence. We would make it clear that progress may go forward without any lessening of sanctity or loss of authority. We would show the world that co-operation in the great tasks of Christianity may flourish, and the work of the churches become more fruitful than ever, without conformity of theological opinion. And also we would prove that respect for Scripture and use of reason, enthusiasm for humanity and reverence for God, may go hand in hand in a more glorious dispensation of the Spirit.

It is our aspiration to lead the world in a glad, uplifting worship that shall be free from the dogmas that misrepresent the universe, and from superstitions that belittle God. What we seek to provide is a praise of God in which the scientist and the philanthropist can join—prayers that do not ask impossibilities of the Almighty, and hymns that indulge no contempt for other religions. What we need is a worship of our Father in heaven that will give us the spirit of heaven, that will lift and unite all men; not a selfish invocation that makes us feel that the Creator is less loving than the creature. It is our aspiration to do all we can to emancipate men from sin, injustice, misery, by a practical application of the method and spirit of Jesus. Not outward reorganisation of the units of society, and not a new distribution of the mere goods of the world; but growth of Inner Life, a purer and stronger love in the heart, a firmer will, a larger thought, a nobler ideal. Then evils will vanish, tears will cease, and gladness will abound. In brief, it is our aspiration to do something to bring in the Kingdom of God by simplifying the message, multiplying the energies, and uniting the forces of Christendom.

This is a brief statement of some of the ideals and aims of those who to-day rejoice in the name "Unitarian." They are the "good news" which we proclaim. And as we stand at the beginning of a new century, we may well ask: How does the Unitarian Gospel look as we view it in the light of modern thought? Have its fundamental positions been destroyed or confirmed by scientific discovery and the general progress of mankind? We claim no freedom from error for our fathers in the liberal faith, and we would not for a moment imply that science and scholarship have simply demonstrated the truth of our doctrines. But we may safely assert that our main principles have been abundantly confirmed by the scientific discoveries and the humanitarian achievements of the last century.

For what is the most central and important teaching of modern science? It is certainly this: The Infinite Life which fills the universe operates according to uniform laws. This truth, fundamental to all the sciences, sweeps aside all mystical schemes of mediation, and leaves no basis for the old systems of sacrificial atonement. Mediatorial redemption is as unreal as magic. The human need is not the propitiation, but the appropriation of God by growth and service. The way of salvation is not sacrificial, but educational. This is admitted everywhere, except in theology. This is adopted everywhere, except in the Church. And this discovery of science respecting the method of God's operations is a complete vindication and confirmation of the Unitarian Gospel. This scientific truth confirms our general interpretation of life, our explanation of the ministry of Jesus, and our description of human destiny.

If we go to the historian he points out to us that whatever has come to expression in human affairs existed from the first potentially in human nature. Carried over into the world of the spirit this means the naturalness of religion and the kinship of all religions. Here, too, we find the confirmation of our fundamental Unitarian doctrines. If this be true, then what we have asserted respecting the naturalness of the religious life, the authority of reason, the need of progress, liberty, and fraternity in the religious world, all these things become as clear as noonday and receive approval as universal truths.

We cannot truthfully claim that the whole Christian world has accepted the Unitarian view of Jesus of Nazareth; but we can truthfully assert that Christendom is rapidly moving in our direction, and that a very large proportion of the most eminent Christian scholars have practically adopted views of Jesus similar to those held by Unitarians. All the changes of opinion made in recent years respecting the nature and ministry of Jesus have carried the Churches in our direction. There is a rapidly growing tendency to place emphasis on the humanity of Jesus, and a corresponding neglect of the texts formerly used to prove his deity. There is an increasing appeal to him as a personal saviour, bringing into prominence the spirit of his life rather than the mystical merits of his death. Every year a larger use is made of the Sermon on the Mount as the substance of Christian doctrine, while the doctrinal portions of Paul's letters are more and more neglected. Wherever we go we find that the constant and emphatic teachings of Church leaders, who would resent being called even Liberals, agree more and more that the essential thing is, not believing about Christ, but living in the spirit of Jesus—precisely the Unitarian plea from the beginning. The revisions of the New Testament text, the new interpretation of doctrinal passages of Scripture, the conclusions of patristic scholarship, the changing spirit and emphasis of the modern pulpit, the increasing use of the life of Jesus for inspiration, these and other significant facts show the astonishingly rapid movement of thought and feeling in the direction of the view of Jesus long held by Unitarians.

Every time an astronomer has turned his telescope to a dim point of light in the Milky Way and brough back tidings from afar; every time the physicist has measured the quick footsteps and traced the correlations of the energies which fill the Universe; every time the biologist has laid bare the methods of life and revealed the affiliations of living forms, illustrating the ways of the one creative Spirit: all these discoveries have confirmed the Unitarian Gospel.

Whenever an explorer has put his spade into the dust of the centuries and uncovered forgotten civilisations; whenever the scholar has reached his hand into the distant past and brought to light a sacred scripture with great words of hope and trust; whenever the student has examined various languages, the vocal and graphic coinage of the human soul, and traced the affinities of speech that reveal the wonderful similarities in the movements of human thought: all these achievements have confirmed the Unitarian Gospel.

Every document of the early Church that has been discovered or studied with fresh insight; every ecclesiastical rite or dogma that has been traced to its source or followed through its successive stages of development; every page of our Bible that has been illuminated by archæology, or reconstructed by scientific criticism, or reinterpreted by philosophical insight: all these triumphs of modern scholarship have confirmed the Unitarian Gospel.

Whoever has struck off the shackles from a human being, giving the liberty that means diviner life for man, woman, and child, for hand, head, and heart; whoever has demonstrated the efficiency of the educational method, whether in the emancipation of a Helen Keller or the wonderful transformations wrought by the Kindergarten; whoever has dealt with even the most vicious classes in hope and love like our great reformers, proving that no human being is without recuperative power, and teaching us that the lowest case of depravity must not be treated as a finality; whoever has spoken with power to the hearts of mankind in these later days, and in the presence of calamity or in behalf of justice has awakened a sense of universal brotherhood: all these moral triumphs, illustrating the spiritual capacity of the human soul, have confirmed the Unitarian Gospel.

It is not for us to stop and ask what such a gospel is worth to the world. It is for us, animated by supreme enthusiasm, to see to it that it is made effective among men. Let us not dwell on our opportunity, that is likely to keep us on a selfish level. But let us rather realise how much the world needs us. Look at that long line of people in the bondage of fear; many crushed by great burdens of ancient traditions and outgrown dogmas—a dead and deadening load —not one can be put to use, but they are afraid to put away a single line of the creed. Many feel the spirit of progress, but they are afraid to grow. Many are stirred by generous impulses, but they are afraid to co-operate with Churches of a different faith. Is it not worth while to strike off these bonds, to destroy these fears, to emancipate these spirits in prison so that they may look the universe full in the face, so that they may follow truth out into the light and joy of a new life, so that they may treat their neighbours and friends with as much courtesy in religion as in social affairs? To give these people freedom from fear and prejudice is our high calling.

Does the world need our word? Let us see. Last Sunday thousands of men and women opened their Bibles and followed the advice of Mr. Moody, who urged that attention be given solely to the "blood passages." Many others read their Bibles in the spirit of Mr. Ingersoll, who was chiefly concerned with the mistakes of Moses and the cruelties recorded in the book of Judges. A vast number of people —and this class is rapidly growing—never open the Bible at all. Is it not worth while to take the old Bible out of the hands of dogmatist and scoffer and open it afresh, so that they may see it in true historic perspective and study it in perfect freedom? Is it not worth while to give the people the "New Bible" that they may find it and read it as it really is? Is it not worth while to transfer attention from the "blood passages" to the great teachings of the Hebrew prophets, from the incidental blunders and barbarities to the great central truths of the Sermon on the Mount? Is it not worth while to introduce the thousands ignorant of Scripture to the real Bible that they may understand the greatest religious literature in the world, and be instructed and inspired by its great ethical lessons? Here is a work that we are called to do, and there is no grander work to be done in the world.

Let a brief reference to conditions in America—and similar conditions exist everywhere—emphasise the need of our work in the world. During this month of June some twenty-five thousand young men and women will march out of our colleges and Universities in the United States with their diplomas in hand. Four years ago, when they came up to these institutions from their homes, they, as a rule, cherished the religious beliefs common to the conservative churches. But many worked in the laboratory and studied in the library, the faith of their fathers vanished. They found it too small to fit the facts. The study of science and history slowly but surely set aside dogma after dogma. Some are in doubt, some are in despair, many are indifferent; very few are adequately equipped with rational and spiritual religious ideals. Their situation presents more than a sectarian opportunity. Here is a great human need; here is a call for our Gospel.

Is it not worth while to arrest the attention of these young people, and to interest them in a religion as modern as the sun, and as free as the air—a religion as rational as science, as broad as humanity, as catholic as philanthropy, as efficient as education? Is it not worth while to equip them with a religious ideal for which no apology is needed; so spiritual and human that all scepticism seems absurd? Is it not worth while to stir these young people with an ethical enthusiasm, a spiritual conviction, that shall be more valuable to them in the stress and temptation of life than their command of language or their knowledge of science? The fact is that the spiritual poverty and religious indifference of thousands can only be removed by a Gospel such as we preach. Surely these facts are sufficient to stir our hearts with victorious zeal, and to guide our hands in fruitful services for the good of mankind.

MANAGERS OF CHURCH SCHOOLS.

SIR,—You report in your last issue the assertion of Mr. Mundella in his speech on the Education question at the Business Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on the 3rd inst., that "of a great many public elementary schools only those could be managers who had been for three years communicants in the Church of England, which excluded, not only all Nonconformists, but the great bulk of Churchmen"; but you say nothing of the correction that I thought it necessary to make to his words if I had not misunderstood them. I now find from your report that I had not misunderstood them, and this being so I am at a loss to know why he did not correct his error then and there—an error which I must deprecate your helping, by simply giving the bare report that you do of his speech, to convey to those who are not properly acquainted with the subject.

It may, or may not, be a fact that it was provided by the trust deeds of some public elementary schools that their managers should have been "for three years communicants in the Church of England," and of these schools, if there be such, I apprehend the four "foundation managers" would have to be such communicants, the words of the Act, Sect. 11, being: "The foundation managers of a school shall be managers appointed under the provisions of the trust deed of the school," there following, however, a certain proviso even as to this; but with regard to the other two managers, the Act, Sect. 6, Sub.-Sect. 2, puts no restriction whatever upon the religious belief of those that may be appointed. In what I said at the meeting, I named that I had myself been chosen by the Council of a Parish a manager of its Church of England school, and that in Bridport a Nonconformist had been chosen as a manager of each of its two Church schools. No whisper of an idea of asking me to accord with the doctrines of the Church of England ever reached my ear, nor, I apprehend, did such for a moment enter the heads of the Parish Council, and I have no doubt I could say the same with regard to the Bridport managers, and the Town Council who appointed them. At all events, there can surely be no doubt that the Act of Parliament is clear that there is no obligation of religious belief on any of the managers of public elementary schools other than the foundation managers, and I had thought that it had been the common knowledge of all who had studied the question that such was the case.

THE DANGER OF TYRANNY.

SIR,—My respect and regard for Mr. Armstrong are such that I wish I could yield to his admonition, and own myself in the wrong, but since I cannot, he will, I feel sure, forgive me for persisting in a cause which I feel bound to maintain; the more readily, because it is one which he has himself stalwartly defended, and now for the first time abandons.

First, as to the minor point singled out by Mr. Armstrong, the discussion of which tends to becloud the real issue. My facts are not to be argued away, nor do I think the criticisms passed upon my phrases go very deep. The money which the Unitarian Association systematically collects from the churches may not be "due" to it; let the word go; the fact remains that such money is from the churches, by the Unitarian Association, systematically collected (see page 30 of the current Report). The objection to the word "paymaster" seems to me equally trifling; the fact to which it refers remains obstinately true (see page 29). Mr. Armstrong's counter-facts are not so accurate; neither of the funds which he names make payments all over the country. The ecclesiastical funds which have been placed under the control of the Association are specified on p. 28 of the Report. They are the Bicentenary Ministers' Fund, the Bowring Fund, and the Chamberlain Fund. "It is true," my friend and late leader admits, "that the Association publishes a handbook." It is also true that it contains the accepted list of our Free Catholic churches and ministers.

Mr. Bowie, to whom Mr. Armstrong refers by name, has earned the confidence and esteem of all who know him. But it cannot be argued that the continual recourse of the churches to him originates simply in our knowledge of his personal qualities. His counsel is sought because he is the secretary of what Miss Pritchard well names "our central Association." There can be no doubt that Essex Hall has become—not to repeat a phrase which seems to give offence—a centre of ecclesiastical administration.

[I have not said that the Association has yet abused its powers. To the best of my knowledge and belief such a charge would be at the opposite pole from the truth. I much regret that I was prevented by illness from attending the annual meeting, and setting right my hasty critics on that point.]

Nor can a plain man doubt that the Unitarian Association is a doctrinal society.

Mr. Armstrong's argument, resting on a doubtful interpretation of the word "principle," does not appeal to me; but if there be a sense in which the Association is not doctrinal, there is another and very real sense in which it is. I have shown that some of its special funds are ecclesiastical; but others, such as the McQuaker and the Bayly Funds, are concerned with theological propaganda. The publications and the personnel of the Association are additional proofs of its doctrinal character.

To come now to the main point. Mr. Armstrong attacked the proposed (and, I trust, destined) development of Conference on the ground that all ecclesiastical organisations issue in tyranny. I challenged his major premise, and he has not made it good. I added, the choice before us is not a choice between this organisation and none, but between this and that; between one which is based on the principle of freedom of thought, and one which is based on a specific (however ill-defined) theological doctrine. There is no instance in history of an organisation which is based on freedom to follow God's light being led by that light into works of darkness. There are many, alas! of doctrinal churches, which stood in their day in the van of religious thought, degenerating into persecutors of the sons of light. I cannot conceive how any true Unitarian, any loyal member of our glorious Association, should prefer a Unitarian church to one which is free and Catholic.

Mr. Armstrong himself wrote in the Inquirer two years ago: "Some of us—pupils of Tayler and Martineau, believers in the teachings of Thom and Beard—have principles in this matter (the question of the name Unitarian as applied to a church) from which we can never depart." And less than two months ago, appealing to the same authority, he said: "In Liverpool for sixty years the three greatest Unitarian divines of the nineteenth century gave all their force and all their gifts to the exposition of the theory that there should be no organic connection between a Unitarian Association based on a theological doctrine and the free life of their churches." I range myself, in this great battle of principles, on the side of Tayler and Martineau, Thom and Beard.

E. W. LUMMIS.

THE MINISTERS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

SIR,—I venture a word on this matter, as a member of the above Society, in support of Mr. F. Wood's appeal. He has made out a good case for the reconsideration of the rules, and probably also for their revision. It ought not to be difficult to devise some fair and just conditions under which ministers between the ages of forty-five and fifty-five might be admitted into membership. Would not the payment of two guineas a year for, say, twelve years, or a commutation payment of twenty-one guineas within three years of admission be something like an equitable arrangement? In any case, the matter is deserving of discussion; and, as very few of the members of the Society can attend its annual meetings, an interchange of opinion through the medium of the Inquirer is a very helpful way of bringing the subject to the notice of all persons concerned, as well as of assisting the acting managers of the Society to undertake the consideration of the question at the meetings of committee, and at the next annual meeting. No doubt those responsible for the management are most desirous to do their utmost in the best interests of ministers collectively and individually. They have proved this abundantly every year the Society has been in existence, and are not likely to be lacking in ready sympathy now that a newly-discovered need has been made known.

"THE LEAVEN OF HEROD."

THE reputed miracle of feeding great multitudes with a few loaves and fishes has probably long been looked upon by many advanced thinkers as a parable, taken (or rather mistaken) literally by those who finally compiled the gospel stories.

But it is rather surprising how little attention has been given to two passages in the gospels themselves, which seem to testify in the most explicit way to the fact that the story was originally no more than a figure.

It will readily be admitted that as a parable the story is remarkably forceful and eminently characteristic of Jesus's style of illustration. "A little leaven," he says, "leaveneth the whole lump." But how much more the leaven of the spirit—for one or two loaves of spiritual food will feed countless multitudes of men and women, and leave behind as much or more than ever. To take this literally is to be guilty of the very grossness of the Samaritan woman who asks to have the wonderful water Jesus speaks of: "That I thirst not, neither come all the way hither to draw."

Let us picture the occasion. Jesus, according to his wont, seeks solitude in a desert place, where he is followed and discovered by the multitude. He then begins to preach and holds them rapt till far on in the day. At last the disciples become anxious. They have provided insufficient, perhaps, for themselves, and they do not like to eat even what they have while all the multitude remain unfed. With a certain amount of very human disingenuousness they profess solicitude for the multitude and are reproached with some such very characteristic rejoinder as follows:—"Have I not already been feeding the multitude with food 'that satisfieth?' (cf. Is. lv. 1, 2) and though I have but a morsel myself, yet there is abundance left for you; nay, such is the food of the spirit that if you will but take from me and give out again, all this multitude may be amply fed, and you yourselves may have even yet more and more to give." But the disciples, on the contrary, thought it would require two hundred pennyworth of bread to feed so great a company, and, accordingly, while Jesus dismisses the people, they cross the lake (according to one version) to get bread for themselves and him. So far the story; but now let us turn to its testimony.

The next incident of which we are told is an encounter with the Pharisees, who ask for a sign.* Jesus indignantly refuses to show them any sign except (scathing charity!) the most stupendous sign of all that they, like the Ninevites, shall repent. Subsequently, in the boat, meditating over the encounter, he breaks forth into a stern warning—there is a terrible power about this unspiritual way of looking at things which, like the Gospel itself, may, from a very small beginning, spread its evil far and wide among men. "Beware," he says, "of the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod."†

Suddenly we seem to see them drop their oars and look round at each other. "He is right, we have forgotten to take bread," their minds still on material things. And when Jesus fully realises what they are "reasoning among themselves" he breaks out into one of the most tragically pathetic expostulations in the whole story. We imagine a kind of despair entering his heart at this sudden revelation of the state of mind of his chosen disciples—well might he warn them against the leaven of the Pharisees. "Why reason ye because you have no bread? Do ye not yet perceive, neither understand? Have ye your heart hardened? Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember?"‡ But now notice the really remarkable sequel. In order to convince them that he is speaking of spiritual leaven he refers to this very parable (as it surely is) of the feeding of the multitudes: "When I break the five loaves among the five thousand, &c." Now how in the name of reason, I ask, could this possibly make his meaning clear if it had been literal bread literally eaten? Obviously he is endeavouring to explain his present figure by a figure he has used before, and, according to the Matthew version, he succeeds; so that we are relieved to read, "then understood they that he bade them beware not of the leaven of bread, but of the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees."§ But how they arrived at this understanding, according to the present version of the story, is scarcely obvious.

Unless Jesus meant his teaching by the bread with which the multitudes were fed, how could he be supposed to mean the Pharisees teaching by the leaven they were to beware of? If Jesus had fed the five thousand with literal loaves surely the disciples scarcely deserved such severe reproach for supposing that it was the literal leaven of the Pharisees of which they were to beware. The astounding thing is that these passages have stood in their place for nearly two thousand years without attracting general attention and discrediting the literal truth of the feeding miracles. The leaven of the Pharisees has been working triumphantly amongst Jesus's followers for two millenniums and has kept these material miracles in their place of credit. Let us hope that at last a more enlightened age may give opportunity to the spiritual leaven to work, which Jesus lived and died to spread.

OBITUARY.

MAJOR BRYAN JOHNSON.

WE have to record the death of Major Bryan Johnson, of Chester, which took place on May 28, at Deganwy, North Wales. He was the youngest son of Mr. John Johnson of the Lead Works and Field House, Chester, and was born in Chester in 1823. Like his father and elder brothers, he took an active part throughout his life in the services and work of Matthew Henry's Chapel. He had been a trustee from 1861, and took a great interest in the recent restoration commemorating its bicentenary. Bryan Johnson was educated at the Rev. R. Brook Aspland's school at Bristol and afterwards at the Proprietory School, Birmingham; and he kept up through life many early friendships formed with the Unitarian families in these towns.

With the exception of the period of his apprenticeship to James Nasmyth, the eminent engineer at Patricroft, who was then inventing the first steam hammer, the whole of Major Johnson's active life was passed at Chester, where he carried on business as an engineer and iron-founder. This business developed largely, and he retained his interest in it as a director of the Hydraulic Engineering Company, down to the time of his death. He was an enthusiastic supporter of the Volunteer movement from its very early days, when he joined the force as a private with a number of his workmen, and retired over twenty years ago as Major of the 2nd Volunteer Battalion of the Cheshire Regiment, formerly the 2nd Earl of Chester's Rifle Volunteers. He was one of those who received the Long Service Medal, only missing the Officer's V.D. by a few days' service.

A liberal but moderate man in all his views he took little part in politics, and though he was a member of the Town Council from 1875 to 1878 he found that other activities appealed more to his kindly nature, and for many years was an energetic member of the Board of the Chester Royal Infirmary, in which he took a very warm interest, devoting much time and thought to the management of this philanthropic institution; also to the Clio training-ship for orphan boys stationed in the Menai Straits. He visited the Clio within a week of his death, and his loss to these institutions will be a very real one.

He took a great interest in the Chester Society of Natural Science, started by the late Canon Kingsley when in Chester, also in the Chester School of Art. Though a staunch Unitarian in a cathedral city, he had a wide sympathy with those of other views. His friends were many, and to them his bright and genial qualities fully revealed themselves, so that he will be missed and mourned by a large circle in Chester and elsewhere.

After cremation at Anfield, Liverpool, the ashes were deposited in a family vault in the Chester Cemetery, on Tuesday, June 2, the service being conducted by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool, and formerly of Chester.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Which ever way the wind doth blow,
Some heart is glad to have it so;
Then blow it east or blow it west,
The wind that blows, that wind is best.

I HAVE seen, in a book, five rules which someone wrote for those people to try who wished to gain contentment; the first is this: "Allow thyself to complain of nothing, not even of the weather."

Now why should we complain of the weather, or rather let us think of some of the reasons why we ought not to do so, and perhaps you can think of others.

Surely whatever weather is sent us in the course of the months and years, is meant; that weather is planned out, like all things in nature are planned, and as the weather acts the part assigned to it, so ought we to act our part, which is to accept the weather just as it is, if not gratefully for ourselves, then in the cheerful spirit that hopes somebody is benefiting by it. We know so little of what goes on in the world that it is very easy for a wet day or even an east wind to be of use somewhere, and we not know it.

Cold as an east wind can be, it may yet prove the beginning of a friendship between two people, meeting as strangers, sheltering in a friendly porch for a moment to escape the cold wind, and who, after starting a conversation provided by "the weather," find a warmth in each other which may grow and abide with them for years or always.

To people in business houses and shops the weather gives an opportunity to pass a friendly word over the counter. I have noticed, even if it is wet or cold, those behind the counter make the best of it by saying cheerfully in their usual make-the-best-of-things voice, "It is very wet to-day." Then, perhaps, one can answer, "But it is clearing up now," and, glancing up, they will catch a glimpse of blue sky or sunny cloud. Or, if it is still raining, and one cannot cheer them with the hope of "clearing up," there still remain the few words set apart from buying and selling.

We all know the proverb "It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good." I think we say it so often that we let it glide over our lips without taking the full meaning into our hearts and minds.

Out of all the days of the year and years of our life, we get many a day "just made for us," and we ought rather to be grateful for those falling to our share, than grumble at the days that don't come specially right for us, but yet may be so for somebody else.

When some children I know are looking forward to a pleasure, they have a way of saying, "I say it will be wet, for then, if it is fine, we shall get what we want, and if it isn't I shall have guessed right"; and there is some comfort got out of having "guessed right."

Suppose we are going to a picnic, or are enjoying one, and down comes the rain! Though we are sure to be sadly disappointed, we shall not lose all the brightness, happiness, and goodness of that special day if we take the disappointment cheerfully. And doing so, opens the door to our seeing things which we would not otherwise have seen or noticed, and which we may remember happily in after years as having happened "on that day when it was so wet, and we couldn't go after all," or "when we sheltered in the large barn and played on the hay." It may be then we notice, for the first time, how exquisite is the earth, and how clear the air after a shower; how jubilant are the tones of the birds; how fresh the flowers look, and how strong is their scent which is wafted in to us through the open barndoors. Then if the rain stops, and though we cannot play in the grass or sit about, we look round for a nice walk. A fresh surprise awaits us. We find that the roads so lately hot, glaring, and dusty, are dusty no more, but cool and refreshing. We wander on and turn into a woodland path. There, the stillness of the wood is broken by a rushing sound, which, if we follow, we shall find to be a stream swollen by the rain. Trying to keep close to it, our feet are led along a narrow path through bushes, and we find ourselves standing on a rock, and facing a grand waterfall, which, but for the rain, would have been small and insignificant.

Have you ever seen a waterfall just after a heavy shower? I am thinking of one in the Lake District, which is always a treat after the wettest of wet "Lake days." How the water dashes down! The rocks and mosses look so refreshed, and the ferns wave their delighted fronds and seem to be sending happy messages by the hurrying waters which will carry them through country and towns; and anyone, miles away, who stands on the bank and listens for them, will hear them, especially if they have once watched the graceful attendant spirits of the waterfall drop their messages into the safe keeping of the water.

And oh! there are so many little things we may notice and be glad of; and years after we may perhaps remember and give thanks for the wet day which came as a blessing in disguise, for on that day our eyes were opened to the fresh beauties and living realities waiting for any or all who will gather them to their hearts.

In the Lake District, which I love so well, even the greyest and wettest day usually begins or ends in glory—the glory of the rising or setting sun. As the day closes in, there, through the grey mist, breaks forth the glorious, purifying sun! Then, if but for a few moments, we can refill our hearts with sunshine, and give thanks to the Creator for that one precious gleam.

THE TRUE REST.

"Fecisti nos ad Te, et inquietum est cor nostrum, donec requiescat in Te."

I SAID "complacency is best;
The self-sufficed alone are blest."
Yet in myself I found no rest.

Then I—"of others' lives be part;
This is of rest the secret art."
Still rest was stranger to my heart.

"Die then to self," I said, "and kill
Love of thy kind; renounce thy will,
Then rest." But I was restless still.

"Father," I cried, "my folly best Approves Thee wise: I leave my quest."
And to my heart, unsought, came rest.

Lord, for Thyself designed are we,
Restless our hearts must ever be,
Until they find their rest in Thee!

TOWARDS FULLER LIFE.

WE now have before us not only the proceedings of the National Conference, but reports of the Whitsuntide meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and other societies. There is in these reports abundant matter for reflection. We may gather from the chief utterances at these meetings, both in Liverpool and London, what are the real interests of our people, and in what directions the aspirations of our religious life are tending.

It is very pleasant to feel that the spirit of harmony has prevailed over every sectional interest, and that the dominant desire has been for mutual understanding, and to discover a clear course of action in which all may unite in self-forgetting service of the world. It would be too humiliating if a little fellowship such as ours should be split up into sharply divided sections, when the great field of common work is waiting; and in face of the urgent duties of our day, and the crying needs of the world, every difference within the ranks must seem paltry and not to be tolerated as a hindrance to united action.

As one people we are hungering for fuller life, and what we have to find is the best method of bringing the whole of our available resources to bear upon the work to which we are called.

There would seem to be two great aims appealing for our loyalty, and yet a third, greater than either, which demands the surrender of our whole strength in self-forgetting service, towards the attainment of which those other two can only be regarded as means to the one supreme end. As Unitarians we are called to bear witness to the highest truth that has been revealed to us, and to the right method for the pursuit and the acceptance of religious truth. As members of Free Churches we are called to maintain the fellowship of a true spiritual worship, to make quiet resting-places, homes of the spirit and of brotherly kindness, where nothing may hinder communion with the Most High. But the service of truth and the worship of the Church alike make towards the perfecting of life, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth. That is the supreme end, by whatever means it may be sought, to make the life with GOD a reality in the world, and felt as the one supreme reality.

In the promotion of Unitarianism we have part in a world-wide movement of thought. It takes many forms in the revolt from old orthodoxies, in the effort to harmonise religious thought with modern knowledge. It appears under various names, is allied with different kinds of church life, and often is quite independent of all church life. With us it is called Unitarianism, and we are warned not to worry about the name. Logic may not be satisfied; but there is this great world-movement of thought, in which we have our part, with great writers, thinkers and poets of many schools, aiming at setting men right with the Universe, teaching them to think the highest and best thoughts of GOD and the world and their own nature, that the way may be clearly opened to them for the true life.

And while as a people we give our adhesion to this movement, and devote the full strength of our British and Foreign Unitarian Association to its promotion, we have a special interest in certain Free Churches, in which a great many of us, at any rate, find our religious home. It is a distinct interest and a very serious trust, to maintain in them the true spirit of worship. Some of those churches have a venerable history, looking back along a line of unbroken religious development to an origin in which "Unitarianism" had no part. And they are to be maintained simply as Free Churches, bound to no ism but that which may be described as surrender to the living GOD, and constant openness to His truth in whatever form a progressive revelation shall make it clear.

Thus the churches have a life of their own to be jealously guarded, which rightly claims the loyal service of all their members, and it is natural that they, simply as worshipping societies, should hold together, for sympathy and mutual helpfulness in the nurture of a true religious life, which must fit them to do their own work for the Kingdom of God. Therefore it is that those who feel deeply the helpfulness of such religious fellowship desire to strengthen the church idea among our people, to see the churches strengthened and grouped together in the close union of local associations and in the wider union of the one National Conference. There is a question, which is said to some extent to burn, whether the National Conference should be so far rendered more effective as an executive instrument as to undertake work now in the hands of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and by that Association most admirably done, in making grants to needy churches and generally directing the efforts of our common church life. The logic of the situation is entirely on the side of the Conference; but the English never were a logical people, and it seems very doubtful that any strong or widespread desire will make itself felt for a radical change in our methods of administration.

The President of the National Conference did indeed make a proposal, by way of an Eirenicon, but confessedly not knowing how widely-felt the need might be which it aimed at meeting. For our own part, we strongly feel that it would be unwise to carry out that particular proposal, even supposing enthusiasm for an ideal could raise the money, to establish a permanent endowment fund for the maintenance of churches. We are inclined to look with more hope to the suggestions of Mr. Wood's paper, which are also in the hands of the Conference Committee, and are offered for the serious consideration of the churches. And meanwhile we are assured that there is no real ground for uneasiness even on the part of the staunchest idealist, for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will not hurt the freest church, but only help, and it is pledged, before any particular doctrine, to certain great principles of freedom and progressive thought, which are entirely in keeping with the spirit of our Free Churches.

Whether it could be maintained in a court of law that such is Unitarianism, and whether history would altogether bear out the contention, we will not venture here to affirm, but it is for the present a good working rule, for there can be no question as to the unexceptionable and truly Catholic spirit in which the Association now does its work; and we will venture to repeat an opinion before expressed, that those who believe absolutely in the Free Church ideal should concentrate their attention for the present on the effort to make the local associations of churches more effective, and to nourish in their constituent members a deeper sense of mutual responsibility and common life.

And for the rest, while we all desire that truth shall prosper, and that the life of the churches shall be strengthened, let us never forget the one supreme end of all our efforts, and find our deepest inspiration, both as servants of truth and as a worshipping people, in the religion of practical and self-forgetting helpfulness, in service of the world's needs, and the present Kingdom of God.

If we are asked why more people do not join our fellowship, and why the loyalty of so many is less than half-hearted, do not let us look for any excuses in circumstances outside ourselves or in the faults of others, but acknowledge that there is not in ourselves enough of the constraining love of a true religious life, that we do not make people feel in our own life that this is the only true way, and there is no fellowship so inspiring and so helpful as this of our Free Churches. Let us throw ourselves with a new ardour, and more utter self-devotion into ministry to others' needs, sharing with them every good and beautiful gift we have, demonstrating by everything we do, no less than by the spirit of worship in our churches, that GOD is in the world, and that we are with GOD in a lowly, reverent, and trustful life. Then shall we be lifted into a new strength and joy of life, and shall see with a new clearness the true place and office of our churches.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

AT a well-attended meeting of the Committee of the Conference on Thursday, June 4, the President, Mr. W. B. Bowring, in the chair, the Revs. C. Hargrove, J. Edwin Odgers and F. W. Stanley, and Messrs. Wallace Bruce, L.C.C., and H. P. Greg were co-opted according to rule. A lengthy discussion followed with reference to the proposals made at Liverpool in the address of Professor Carpenter and in the subsequent paper by Rev. J. Wood, and these were ultimately referred to a sub-committee for consideration and early report.

The following is the complete list of the Committee for 1903-1906 :—

President: W. B. Bowring.

Vice-Presidents : J. R. Beard, W. Blake Odgers, Harry Rawson, Revs. J. E. Carpenter, S. A. Steinthal.

Treasurer : H. Chatfeild Clarke.

Hon. Secretaries : A. W. Worthington and Chas. Fenton.

Elected at the Liverpool Conference: Revs. J. Wood, C. Roper, J. Ellis, H. Gow, E. I. Fripp, J. C. Street, J. C. Odgers, W. H. Drummond, Miss F. Hill, and Messrs. P. H. Leigh, J. Cogan Conway, and A. Nicholson.

Elected by District Societies ; Revs. R. A. Armstrong, D. Walmsley, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, W. G. Tarrant, Dendy Agate, C. J. Street, R. Travers Herford, J. H. Bibby, J. A. Kelly, B. C. Constable, F. K. Freeston, C. C. Coe, J. McDowell, J. Harwood, F. Walters, H. D. Roberts, A. Hall, G. H. Vance, Miss Tagart, and Messrs. L. N. Williams, Dr. John Barlow, Grosvenor Talbot, A. H. Worthington, and Byng Kenrick.

Co-opted: Revs. C. Hargrove, J. Edwin Odgers, F. W. Stanley, Messrs. Wallace Bruce and H. P. Greg.

"GENTLY, my son, gently!" said the monk; "nothing is lost by patience. See how long it takes the good Lord to make a fair flower out of a little seed; and He does all quietly, without bluster. Wait on Him a little in peacefulness and prayer, and see what He will do for thee."

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE CONFERENCE.

AT the Conference on "Our Work at Home and Abroad," held at Essex Hall, on Thursday morning, June 4, the chair was taken by the President, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., and the first paper was read by Miss M. B. Westenholz, of Copenhagen, on "The World-Mission of Unitarianism."

This paper, by an unfortunate misunderstanding, we failed to secure in time for publication this week.

The Rev. Jas. Hocart, who was the first speaker after the paper, said that he wished to dwell upon one point of the great mission of Unitarianism, viz., the reconciliation between religion and freedom of thought. He had almost constantly laboured in Roman Catholic countries, and for the greater part of the time entirely among people who were Catholics by birth. Thus situated, he had perpetually experienced that the doctrine of religious authority constituted a most serious obstacle to the progress of religion. He was still hampered in his work by the wide spread belief that the whole of Protestantism eschews free thought. In Belgium and France the grand name of free thought was monopolised by people outside religion. A prominent Paris professor maintained that all positive religions were intolerant, not by accident, but by essence. When a man said he was in possession of absolute, supernaturally-revealed truth, the temptation was strong to impose it on rebellious minds. On the other hand, he would not care to belong to an association or church without doctrine; he wanted something to believe and preach ardently and passionately, not because it was written, but simply because of its own rational evidence. And this was what they were doing, endeavouring to reconcile freedom of thought with religion. For this he offered his respectful homage.

Mrs. Ginever (née Miss Györy, of Budapest) spoke of her country's struggles for liberty during centuries. She found a great similarity between this country and Hungary in different ways, one of which was broad-minded tolerance. The Hungarians were tolerant of each other's creeds. The fundamental teaching that God is one ought to become the great word of salvation for all the world. God was one, one Father of all. His name could not be blasphemed more vilely than by people who hate their fellow men. She remarked upon the activity of the Association, and how it was progressing. This activity kindled the sacred flame of free knowledge. One of the mistakes in the religious life of the present time was that the churches forgot to keep pace with teaching. Hail to the church which understood close communion with the mental life, for the great result would be that the two would strengthen each other and raise one another.

A Mission to Germany.

Miss G. VON PETZOLD, M.A. (a student for the ministry, at Manchester College, Oxford), spoke of the mission that English Unitarianism might undertake in Germany. It might appear to them an extraordinary suggestion that there was a field of work for them in her country. For was it not in Germany that modern theological literature had its origin? Was it not due to the unwearied labours of a whole line of German scholars that theology now ranks as a science? Was not the greater part of the theological work done in this country for the last twenty or thirty years based on the methods and results of German scholarship? Nevertheless, their work was needed in that country. For, although Germany was teeming at the present day with first-rate theologians, although there were liberal and practically Unitarian professors of theology at every university, in the schools the teaching of orthodox Christianity still prevailed, in the pulpits the Apostles' Creed was recited every Sunday, and the mass of the people were left utterly in the dark with regard to the progress made in the study of the Bible. There was little or no popular theological literature, few, if any, devotional books written in the liberal spirit, and no prayer books, so far as she was aware, of a modern type. The consequence was that boys and girls left school, confirmed in the old traditional doctrines of the Lutheran faith, and, not having been taught to think on the subject, the Bible remained for them a more or less unintelligible book, the contents of which they had been taught to believe indiscriminately. Its truths had been so marred to their young minds as never to have become spiritual realities to them. Then, when they began to think for themselves, the great disillusionment followed; they found that the world around them really did not care about the matter; professional and business men had thrown it all aside; to get on in the world, to live and let live was their ideal, and when those young men and women turned to the theological literature of the day, they found only works of scholarship, difficult for the untrained lay mind to understand. There were young souls thirsting for truth—perhaps at the very turning-point of their lives, their character, as it were, in the balance. Who was there to stretch forth a helping hand, to teach them how to right themselves with the Universe, to show them the truth, and all the wonderful growth and revelation of truth, which ran through the Biblical records? Who was there to open their eyes to the true spirit of religion that could never die, but would live and grow as long as human souls were yearning for a God to comfort them in their sorrows, and to brace them for their battles? It seemed to her a terrible neglect on the part of their German theologians, that they had allowed their young men and women to become indifferent to the eternal realities of religion. She might be mistaken, and her experience was in the north rather than the south of Germany; but it seemed to her that in Prussia, at any rate, the choice lay between the old orthodox evangelicalism and blank indifference and materialism, and that for the great majority of thinking men, the old beliefs were hopelessly exploded; while any suggestion of the possibility of a new liberal religion would be met by an incredulous smile. She firmly believed that there would not be so much moral depravity, callousness, gross materialism among her countrymen, if there had been from the first a little more Unitarianism, a religion outspoken, earnest, honest at heart, however faulty and narrow on the outside. Yet the German temperament in itself was an intensely religious one. The metaphysical instinct was native to the German mind, and religious enthusiasm, fervour, and self-forgetfulness were hidden forces, slumbering in the hearts of the people, waiting for liberal reformers to bring them once more into play.

Would they undertake this task? Would they become missionaries to the German people? They must call all German scholars to their aid, and work hand in hand with the liberal clergymen of the day. They would not find it plain sailing, and would not take the people by storm. They would have to feel their ground at first, making friends of such men as Harnack and Gunkel, Soden and Delitzsch; they would have to feel the pulse of the people, overcome their prejudices, and learn to love them. But if anyone objected that they had more than enough to do at home, and they ought not to go out of their way to undertake this work in Germany, she had seen enough of Unitarianism to know that it was not all that it might be; she had seen something of its inefficiency, its mediocrity, its lack of the right men in the right places. But for that very reason she said Go to Germany! It would widen their prospect, enlarge their interests, and infuse new life into their movement, and their labours at home. Once get the great German theologians on their side, once set the religious impulse free that was slumbering in the hearts of the German people, and they would be inspired with a new hope and a new courage.

But they must not undertake this work unless their heart was in it. What was needed in Germany was life, living bread, living energy, wholeheartedness, high ideals, self-sacrifice. Let them take those things—as a cup of cold water—to their brothers and sisters in the spirit of Christ.

Unitarian Work in England.

Mr. J. C. WARREN, then read a paper on "The Work that is Demanded of Unitarians in England To-Day." After an opening allusion to the proposals laid before the National Conference by Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Wood and Mr. Dendy, which appeared to him somewhat visionary, and which, with the whole subject of organisation, he should not attempt to discuss, Mr Warren said that with regard both to their duty and their work as Unitarians, their first duty was to emphasise among themselves and present to those outside their pale their theological and doctrinal position. Of what were their denominational papers—or, at all events, a large proportion of them—full? Not of the progress of their common faith, or the best methods of promoting the acceptance of what touched them so nearly, but of constantly recurring letters and articles on such barren subjects as the freedom of their churches and the suitability of their name. Yet how many of them imagined their spiritual liberty to be in danger, or even threatened? He would venture to urge a truce to all that. Heartily he echoed Mr. Wood's words at the Conference, when he begged his hearers to put aside the name controversy; but he had a shrewd suspicion that it was to Mr. Wood and his friends that the name controversy owed its prominence, and they would do well to remember the reply of the French statesman, when certain bands of freebooters, then very prominent in France, suggested a general disarmament, and say with him, Let "messieurs les assassins" begin!

However that might be, let them drop those fruitless controversies and get to real work, whether of organisation (should anything further of the kind be needed, which he doubted) or of doctrinal propagandism. Let them hear no more of Free Catholicity. To the vast body of their laymen the subjects he had mentioned did not in any way appeal, and the result of their discussion was only to disappoint and dishearten those who would gladly be up and doing something for the cause they had at heart. He repeated that their first duty as Unitarians—to his mind a very pressing duty—was to emphasise and spread their Unitarianism, and what to most of them was the very essence of Unitarianism, the duty of absolute fidelity to conscience and conviction.

They had suffered in the past, he was not sure that they were not still suffering, from the idea that it was not right to impart special doctrinal training to the young, and the constant insistence on their freedom from doctrinal bonds too often led to a practical indifference to doctrine, and the falling away of their members. They ought to insist more on the importance of truth and the duty of loyalty to their own Church. He thought that as a body they would be improved by a little more backbone. Many of them seemed to be suffering at the present time from a specially developed bump of "approbativeness"—they were so anxious to have other people's good opinion. He recalled a speech made by their President several years ago, in which he had said he was tired of being in the right with two or three—he wanted to be in the right with two or three millions. That time would come, but it would not come by any exaggerated tolerance of others, by any invertebrate teaching or any attempt to group their Churches under some meaningless sesquipedalian name, but by steady work, by the enforcement of their doctrines, and the maintenance of their spiritual integrity.

Mr. Warren went on to urge the importance of doctrinal teaching in Sunday-schools. He wished a Unitarian catechism were a possibility, but he supposed the cry of outraged freedom would be raised if any real attempt were made to introduce it. Yet a couple of generations back such catechisms were not unknown. There was one, compiled by the Rev. Benjamin Carpenter in use at the High Pavement in Nottingham some fifty or sixty years ago, and no one seemed to be a penny the worse, indeed, their older people who learned it, were, if he might judge from their enthusiasm for and attachment to the chapel and school, very much the better for it. He feared there were many Sunday-schools through which their scholars passed without having heard a word of definite and direct Unitarian teaching. Could nothing be done to remove that reproach? For their young people, not touched by the Sunday-school, he also urged systematic instruction, followed, as opportunity offered, by a dedication service and a welcome into the congregation. That had been tried in several places with success, and he would have it carried out in a regular and definite manner in all the Churches where at all practicable. In connection with such instruction, he thought that periodical examinations by a central body, that should offer certificates or even prizes, would be of advantage, and some sort of handbook would be of great help, which that Association seemed the fittest body to provide.

Referring to the programme of "new and enlarged work" drawn up by the Association, he emphasised the importance of the proposed visiting of congregations by some of their ablest ministers. Too often congregations were left for years in solitude, and were in urgent need of the advice and encouragement which such visits would bring. And for his own part he thought there should be no delay in the appointment of a travelling missionary to devote himself to propagandist work in towns and villages where there was now no centre of Unitarian teaching.

Turning to the subject of publications, he thought their weekly papers might be made more serviceable to the cause of Unitarianism. The ordinary members of their chapels were not given to reading philosophical articles or disquisitions on abstruse points which had never arisen before, and which they must all heartily hope would never arise again—but they did seek to know what was going on in their different chapels, while efforts made by one congregation often gave most valuable hints and suggestions to its neighbours. They wanted to know more fully than at present what their churches were doing. Their denominational life and work, and the centres of that life and work, required "writing up," and he trusted that he might without impertinence ask their editors to keep that point in view.

Taking up another point, he asked his ministerial friends kindly to consider how far it was desirable for them to take a prominent part in controversial and party politics. Far be it from him to say that ministers personally and as individuals were not to join therein (though he was satisfied they would consult the best interests of their congregations by abstaining from so doing), but they must remember that it was difficult, if not impossible, for them to entirely divest themselves of their representative character, and they should take the greatest care to make it clear that it was only as individuals they spoke or acted. The time had gone by when members of their churches were certain to "vote solid" on every political or social question, and less than ever before were laymen led by their spiritual advisers on those topics. He knew he should be met by the answer that there was nothing into which religion did not enter, or which did not concern the religious teacher. It might be so; but the religious teacher often found it difficult to draw the line between his functions in that capacity and his position as a party politician, and when that border line was reached, his action might be fraught with serious danger to his charge. The true part of their ministers was to help them to see the ideal right, and they might be trusted to fitly apply the teaching.

He had no desire merely to criticise their ministers. No one had a deeper respect than he for their splendid enthusiasm and self-sacrifice, their efforts under most difficult circumstances, their cheery optimism, their indomitable courage, but he should not be quite honest if he had not spoken as he had done. Finally, he said that there was one other thing necessary, and that was, for laymen and ministers alike, a plentiful allowance of that spade-work, of which they had lately heard so much. With it and a faithful adherence to those principles, which had received so brilliant an exposition in the President's address, he had no fear for the future.

He regretted that he had said so little that was worth listening to, so little that could be of real help—so much, perhaps, that might have been better left unsaid—but he had spoken from an earnest desire to promote their cause, and as one who, of however little service he could be, cherished among the chief interests of his life the progress of the Unitarian faith, and as one of his deepest attachments the Unitarian name.

At the conclusion of Mr. Warren's paper, there remained very little time for discussion, and only one speech was made.

The Rev. J. C. STREET first made some reference to work in other countries, and then turned to the questions raised by Mr. Warren's paper.

He agreed with Mr. Warren that the absolute duty of the day was for them to proclaim their faith, and they would be wise in dropping mere verbal controversies. Mr. Warren had said he was anxious there should be absolute fidelity to conscience and convictions. This spiritual veracity was the one thing needful. As for doctrinal teaching in their schools, doctrine was in danger of becoming dogma. He was afraid of the crystallisation of doctrine into dogma. With regard to their work at home he was old enough to remember the wave of spiritual earnestness which passed over their churches between forty and fifty years ago, and it had seemed to him during the meetings of that week as though a new Pentecost might be coming for them. He concluded with an eloquent appeal that men might be sent forth, in the spirit of faith, free to deliver the message that was given to them.

[Of other passages of Mr. Street's speech, and particularly of what we gather from the President's concluding remarks to have been some criticism of the INQUIRER, we regret that our reporter has preserved no note.—ED. INQ.]

The PRESIDENT, in summing up the discussion, said that Mr. Warren's paper recalled to him old times. He had often known the joy of battle with him. He was the kindliest and most delightful man to disagree with whom he had ever known. Referring to Mr. Street's criticisms of their newspaper press, he suggested that such criticisms might lead to some discouragement. He had been drawn into some official connection with one of their papers, and he found that they received sheaves of advice, but advice perplexingly varied. One counsellor thought that they would do no good unless they filled their columns with reports of local meetings. Another thought that mere local meetings ought to be ignored, and that they should aim exclusively at becoming such an organ of the higher religious thought as would appeal to the world at large. They had to steer a middle course. The amateur reporting of the local enthusiast did not always result in such accounts of meetings as would be widely appreciated by the larger public. He would only plead for a little more sympathy with the difficulties involved in conducting their various journals, and a little more gratitude to the men who were devoting their lives to it—a little less criticism, and a little more help. He would close the Conference by recalling them to the high ideals set before them in the address of Miss Westenholz, with its call to every nation, as every individual, to work out its own salvation.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union was held at Essex Hall on Thursday afternoon, June 4th. The chair was taken by the President, Miss TAGART, who, in opening the proceedings, apologised for the absence of Lady Wilson, the treasurer, who to their great regret was obliged by ill-health to resign the office.

The report of the Committee and the accounts were presented by Miss FLORENCE HILL, the hon. secretary, who announced that Miss Ethel C. Lake had undertaken the treasurership, in succession to Lady Wilson.

The report opened with a reference to the loss sustained by the death of two vice-presidents, Lady Bowring and Miss Davenport Hill, and then gave particulars of the work, which had been steadily maintained both by the Central Society and various missions throughout the country. The close of the Rev. Alfred Amey's ministry at Framlingham and Bedfield, and his removal to Colyton, after thirteen years' service, was recorded, and the settlement of Mr. R. Newell as his successor, with a good prospect of successful work. Particulars were also given of the delightful "co-operative holiday" at Aberystwyth, organised last summer by Miss Tagart. The total receipts for the general fund and for the Suffolk Mission, including grants of £50 from the B. & F.U.A. for the latter, amounted to £239 11s. 5d., the expenditure being £253 11s. 9d. It would, therefore, be necessary to take £14 0s. 4d. from the Reserve Fund, practically exhausting it, to meet the adverse balance of the year, and the committee appeals for an additional income of at least £30 for the Suffolk Mission Fund.

Miss LUCAS, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that Mission was a testimony to women's work and a true lay-ministry. With a small amount of money a great deal was done. They had been faithful in small things, and she hoped that friends would see that they were scripturally rewarded. The Mission had done most efficient work in spreading literature, thus sowing seed and preparing the ground for further work, and affording to inquirers personal help in an unobtrusive and quiet way. Correspondents were prompted by different motives. Some wrote merely out of curiosity, but even that was good, and helped to do away with ignorance and prejudice. Others had known some Unitarians whose life and work were such that they wanted to know something of the religion which produced such noble characters. Others were real inquirers, brought up in a faith against which their soul revolted, longing for some higher conception of religion. And often they found with joy in Unitarian literature thoughts and ideals which answered to their need, and a new world was revealed to them. Correspondents frequently wrote with gratitude and wonder, saying that they found Unitarianism just answered to their own thoughts, but they had not known there was any body of people teaching such truths. The Postal Mission had been a God-send to many, and particularly to people in isolated places, debarred by circumstances from any helpful religious fellowship. Unitarianism was not merely a question of theological argument, but of life in its highest meaning. With some it was a question of religion or no religion, and so they felt that their cause was indeed worth supporting.

Miss GITTINS, seconding the motion, said their work was very pleasant, but it was more than that, it was more far-reaching than they knew. It gave just the help that people wanted, when they were confronted with the great problems of human life and destiny, giving them the opportunity of quietly reading for themselves at home, and helping them to think.

The PRESIDENT then introduced Miss Sewell, formerly head of the Southwark Women's University Settlement, who, after wearing herself out and building up many stalwart workers to take her place there, had gone to a quieter sphere in the country, but one not less important to the true welfare of the people. They were greatly indebted to her for her kindness in consenting to read a paper to them on

RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL WORK IN VILLAGES.

Miss SEWELL, at the beginning of her paper, said that social work must depend on social deals. Their ideal was determined by the desire to make life good and pleasant for all, and especially for those who had less than themselves. There must be for all a certain amount of wealth, health, and education to fit them for the occupation they wished to follow, and to widen their horizon, and furnish fresh interests beyond their round of daily work. Was that their true aim, or did it conflict with any social theories? Did they really wish to equalise society on the basis of worth? Theoretically they did, but practically many were timid. They were afraid of making people discontented, and that perhaps there would soon be no one left to do the disagreeable things they did not like to do for themselves, and that their villages would be deserted. But justice must be the best wisdom in the end, and if it was just to give everyone his opportunity, had they not better forget theories and go forward? But as a matter of fact the fears were groundless. What was wanted was education which recognised the need of training in all kinds of work. Their aim had been not merely to raise an individual here and there, but to raise the dignity and the remuneration of industrial and unskilled work by putting intellect into it. Agriculture required mind as much as anything else, and only so could survive as an industry in England. They must raise the estimation in which it was held by a careful training of those who engaged in it. Higher education rightly conceived would maintain labour in the country; but this, hitherto, had been very imperfectly recognised in their elementary schools.

Miss Sewell then proceeded to speak from a wide range of knowledge, and with the insight of true social wisdom, of the many opportunities of public service open to cultured residents in villages; but we are tempted to keep our notes of this part of the paper until we are able to make fuller use of them than would be possible here.

Miss CLEPHAN, who was the first speaker after the paper, said that they could do most of the things Miss Sewell had suggested, if it were not for the Board of Education. The kind of hand-book issued for the study of special country subjects was a weariness both to teachers and children. School managers, and especially ladies, had a great opportunity through coming into close and sympathetic touch with the children. The main difficulty in social work among uneducated people was that they tired of everything so quickly, and the workers had constantly to be thinking of fresh things to interest them, so that in time the workers found their inventiveness fail. There was a great mission for agriculture in this country. A school inspector, noting the result of education in a village school, had said that the lads were getting too good to go on to the land. But the truth was that the land was too good for most of them to go on to it. What they needed was a new wisdom to understand all that the land could teach them, of the better life they could live in close contact with Nature.

The Rev. J. BELLAMY HIGHAM, Mr. W. GLOVER, Mrs. J. H. CROOKER, and Mr. R. NEWELL having spoken, the resolution adopting the report and accounts was unanimously passed, and on the motion of Mr. W. H. SHRUBSOLE, seconded by Mr, H. G. CHANCELLOR, the officers and committee were elected, Miss E. C. Lake being appointed treasurer.

After a few words from Mrs. GINEVER, who spoke of the efforts being made to improve the conditions of the peasants of Hungary, a resolution of thanks to Miss Sewell and the President, moved by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed and seconded by Mr. V. R. Shinde, brought the meeting to a close.

THE annual meeting of the Winifred House Children's Convalescent Nursing Home, held at University Hall on Wednesday afternoon, we must report next week.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE tenth annual meeting was held at Essex Hall, on Friday, June 5. In the afternoon a Conference was held, the Rev. Charles Hargrove in the chair, supported by the Earl of Carlisle (President), Mrs. H. Shaen Solby, Mr. J. Bredall (hon. sec.), and others.

After an opening hymn and prayer, the CHAIRMAN, in his opening address, remarked on the small number of Unitarian ministers who were enrolled as total abstainers. They ought to be abstainers for two reasons: for their own good, for he could say after an experience of three years that they would be healthier in mind and body, and that was the common experience of all who had tried; and also for the sake of others, for the effects of drink upon the world brought a terrible curse, and whoever drank his moderate glass was helping to encourage the evil. Three years ago 160 of their ministers had taken the unpopular course of protesting against the war, and had been content to be in the despised minority; but the evils of the drink traffic were greater than those of the war, there was greater expense, more waste of life, more ruin and misery, and the evil remained with them, while the war had passed. He hoped that before long there would be at least as many of their ministers to protest against that greater evil.

Miss M. ADA SALE, of Northampton, then read a paper on "How can we Strengthen the Temperance Life in our Churches?" Their position, she stated, ought to be in the very forefront of the temperance ranks, since they believed in character before creed, and in the gradual growth in goodness, as better than any conversion. They must be ever on their guard against everything that lowered the moral and religious tone of life. She doubted whether their churches realised the magnitude of the evil. There ought to be a Band of Hope and a Temperance Society in every one of their churches, and they should be regarded as of equal importance with the Sunday-school. Nothing should interfere with the regularity of that work, and children of all classes should be drawn in. A Temperance Home Circle was also a good thing to encourage, with members over fourteen, and monthly social evenings. Saturday has been found a good evening for such meetings, when, together with games and other entertainments, they had an address on some aspect of the temperance question. But if the church was not strong enough for a monthly meeting, let them at least keep a register of total abstainers, and hold occasional meetings. They should also secure an evening for their subject at the meetings of Mutual Improvement and Debating Societies. If they as Unitarians could not take much part in rescue work, they should do all the more in preventive work. Many abstainers did very little temperance work, but as religious people they should be made to realise that their help was needed. Temperance Sunday, the last Sunday in November, should be made the most of. It was pleasant to note that the Band of Hope Union had no theological test of membership, and that about half of their societies were affiliated to it. Temperance reform would only be effected by the patient, steadfast efforts of average workers. They must each worthily make their own contribution.

The paper was followed by discussion in which Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR, Mr. F. ADKINS, representing the U.K. Band of Hope Union; the Rev. F. SUMMERS, Dr. HERBERT SMITH, and the Earl of CARLISLE took part. Dr. SMITH, while insisting on the importance of total abstinence, said that he never felt able to sign a pledge, and did not allow his children to do so either. The Earl of CARLISLE said that he had at one time had the same feeling, but was convinced now that they could not get on without the pledge. It ought not, however, to be regarded as a vow taken for life, but as an undertaking which could be given up, if necessary, on mature consideration.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

After tea, and a short musical programme by Mr. Duncan S. Miller with his Canadian sleigh-bells and Mr. J. D. Saul with dulciana hand-bells (but the sleigh-bells were not in tune with the piano), the business meeting was held..

The EARL OF CARLISLE, as President, was in the chair.

Mr. J. BREDALL read the annual report, which stated that the Association now consisted of 65 societies and 152 personal members. Sixty-four of their ministers were enrolled as total abstainers. They had to mourn the loss of the Revs. E. S. Anthony, T. W. Scott, and Henry Solly.

Mr. F. A. EDWARDS presented the accounts, which showed total receipts £63 3s. 2½d. and expenditure £82 8s. 3d., this reducing the balance in hand from £31 0s. 6d. to £11 15s. 5½d.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that while the progress made was matter for congratulation, they should guard against becoming too exclusively a Band of Hope society. The Band of Hope, admirable as it was, without an adult society, into which the young people could automatically pass, was only a stop-gap. The greatest danger was to lads when they left school and got among other young men, and thought it manly to drink. Just then, they were leaving the Band of Hope, and they ought to have the protection of fellowship which an affiliated adult society could give. Turning to wider aspects of the Temperance movement, he strongly deprecated divisions in the ranks, which had latterly hindered progress in what had become to some extent a popular movement. In face of a united strongly organised trade, with enormous interests, they would fail of their due influence unless they could silence discordant voices, and all work together for the one great end. The difference mostly arose out of political action, in judging what action was at the moment most opportune. The importance of such issues ought not to be exaggerated, for even if they got all they aimed at through legislation to-morrow, it would be comparatively useless unless supported by a great body of earnest temperance feeling. That was what they ought all to join together in producing. The resolution on the subject of licensing to be proposed to that meeting was of the greatest importance. They were in danger of suffering a serious drawback to temperance work throughout the country, which would render it materially harder in the future. In face of this they should all unite, and not merely pass the resolution formally, but use every means to impress on people the importance of doing all they could in the matter.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, in seconding the adoption of the report, told of a new effort of their Liverpool Society, which had started a company for the opening of one or more temperance public-houses, as attractive as they could be made, and managed on business principles, but not for the purpose of making the fortunes of the promoters. They bound themselves not to take more than 5 per cent., and did not intend to take more than 3½. Further profits would go towards founding more houses. They were very anxious to have a large body of shareholders, that the interest in the work might be wide-spread. A prospectus of the Liverpool Temperance Public-House Co. could be had from the secretary, Mr. B. P. Burroughs, of 19, Sweeting-street, and the 10s. shares could still be applied for. He should like every member of that society to join, and he hoped their success would encourage workers in other cities to follow their example.

Mrs. J. H. CROOKER followed with an earnest and encouraging speech. She quoted a saying of Lucretia Mott's to Wendell Phillips in one of the darkest hours of the American struggle against slavery, "Do not forget that God and one are always a majority." In that spirit they ought to carry on their work. They could not perhaps realise the difficulty of the work in America, but in Chicago forty languages were spoken, and there and in all the great cities of the States, Europe was there voting and clamouring for free liquor. Their best help in that was in the public schools: only by training up the children as American citizens could they resist those other forces which made for the destruction of the people. Another hopeful sign was that the great railways, the banks, and other business undertakings were realising the importance of temperance to their interests, and the strictest discipline against drinking was being enforced. And they had temperance instruction in the public schools. Amid all differences of doctrine, the home, the church and the public school were as one, making for the high type of morality which belonged to temperance habits, methods, and connections.

Mr. Z. TOYOSAKI expressed his sense of the need of temperance work in Japan. The Unitarian movement in Tokyo had not as yet any special temperance department, but they must start some work of the kind. There was a branch of the American Women's Temperance movement which they might join. Doctrinal differences ought not to separate them in such work. The Unitarians of Japan were distinctly social reformers, to whom humanitarianism was almost synonymous with Unitarianism.

After a few words from the Revs. A. AMEY and W. G. TARRANT, the resolution was unanimously passed.

On the motion of the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, seconded by the Rev. Dr. J. H. CROOKER, the officers and committee were then appointed, and the following resolution, moved by the Rev. C. Hargrove, seconded by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, and supported by the Rev. R. H. Greaves, was passed:—

Whereas 'the Licensing Bench is a body interposed between the licensee and the public for the protection of the public' (Lord Watson):

And whereas 'the Justices have an absolute discretion to determine, in the interests of the public, whether a license ought to be granted' (Lord Herschell):

This meeting protests against any attempt, whether by means of a Compensation Scheme, as in Mr. Butcher's Bill, or by a Suspensory Bill, such as that of Sir W. Hart Dyke, to prevent the magistrates from continuing to exercise their legal powers freely for the advantage of the public."

After a vote of thanks to the President and speakers, hymn and Benediction brought the meeting to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Bermondsey.—The annual school excursion is to take place on July 15. The expenses amount to between £4 and £5. Contributions sent by generous donors for this purpose will be gratefully acknowledged by the minister, Rev. Eustace Thompson, 47, Upper Grange-road, Bermondsey, S.E.

Cardiganshire Churches United Singing Festival.—This year the old town of Carmarthen, famous for its Theological College, and hallowed by its associations in the sight of all earnest Unitarians, was the rallying place of the tribes representing the Cardiganshire Musical Union. On the morning of June 8th they came in force by special trains from Lampeter, Llanybyther, Pencader, and Llandyssul to celebrate the twelfth festival, and when they assembled at the Tabernacle Baptist Chapel, kindly lent for the occasion, the number of singers and their friends was not much below a thousand. Everything conspired to make the meeting a memorable one. The weather was all that could be desired; the committee had been fortunate in the place of meeting and in the choice of conductor (Rev. D. Evans, Cwmbach). The kindness of the Baptist friends at the Tabernacle was conspicuous, and the presence of visitors from far and near, such as the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., of London, now in charge of the Cardiff pulpit; Rev. T. J. Jenkins, Gellionen; Rev. Fisher Short, of Aberdare; Rev. J. P. Kane, Dowlais; Mr. Colby Evans, ex-Mayor of Carmarthen; Mr. Titus Evans, Mr. Principal Evans, Mr. Weatherall, and a host of others, was very cheering. Most of the time at the morning and afternoon meetings was taken up by the rendering of the musical programme, the "Hallelujah Chorus" coming as a finale. In addition to the addresses of the two presidents, the Rev. E. O. Jenkins, Llwynrhydowen, and Professor Weatherall, speeches were called for from the Revs. James Harwood and Fisher Short, both of whom heartily responded. To the former, especially, the proceedings of the day were a novel experience, and the sight of some 800 people singing with all the might and enthusiasm of their Welsh souls, must have been exhilarating. The thanks of the committee are especially due to Mr. Harwood for his first appearance in West Wales on this occasion, and for his earnest words of sympathy and encouragement.

Chester.—We are glad to note that the J. K. Montgomery has been elected a member of the new Educational Committee for the city.

London (Rhyl-street).—Some 50 people, including a good number of men and strangers, met together on Thursday evening, June 4, to take part in a service, conducted by the Rev. J. P. Hopps, in the name of "Our Fathers' Church," his subject being "A message from heaven concerning comfort." His text, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people," was a message from God to his children on the earth, telling them to comfort one another by their thoughts, deeds, and words of sympathy, humanity and hope. God's love was manifested through the love of men. Human beings were also to comfort themselves, and one another, by believing, accepting and resting upon the infinite love of God, the heavenly Father of all. It was as if God said, "There is nothing to fear; do not be afraid because of the wrong things men have said of Me. I love you all; believe in My love; let it be a joy, a comfort, and a strength to you to live a beautiful, human, helpful and hopeful life on earth, at the end of which I shall take you to Myself for fuller life in heaven." It was a service sure to do good of the very best kind. It is contemplated to hold open-air services on Sunday evenings, beginning June 14.

London (Stepney-green, E.).—Last Sunday was a red-letter day at College Chapel. In the afternoon Vladimir Tchertkoff, the friend of Leo Tolstoy and editor of the Free Age Press, gave a most interesting lecture on the religious, political and social life in Russia. He touched on the sharp contrasts in the social condition of the leisured and the working classes: the luxury and idleness on the one hand, the extreme toil and want on the other; the evils of a State Church, of capital punishment, and of war. The heroism of the peasant Doukhobors was mentioned, and their bravery in refusing military service, and readiness rather to endure imprisonment and the lash. The lecture was illustrated by excellent slides. One striking series showed the emigration of the Doukhobors and their settlement in their new Canadian home. Appropriate music played by a gifted Russian gentleman further illustrated most agreeably the subjects touched on. The lecture ended with scenes from the life of Jesus, and Mr. Tchertkoff eloquently contrasted the principles there exemplified with those of modern life. Following on this lecture was the Postal Mission Conference on "Christian Progress," presided over by Mr. Ginever, and in which Mr. Tchertkoff took the leading part; and though very divergent views were expressed, no one could fail to be impressed with the splendidly earnest and Christian spirit in which Mr. Tchertkoff unflinchingly tried to apply to the solution of each question brought forward the principles of truth, justice and peace. After the evening service, conducted by Mr. Ginever, an address was given by Mrs. Ginever, who, in eloquent and touching words, spoke on the duties of life more particularly in relation to those of women and the home. The congregation and friends parted, feeling they had seldom had a more profitable and inspiring Sunday, or one which gave rise to more serious and searching thoughts.

Maidstone.—Flower services were conducted on Sunday by the Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A. The choir and the scholars rendered the special music very effectively. The children's offerings of flowers were afterwards sent to Blackfriars Mission.

Manchester.—The annual scholars' festival was held as usual on Whit Sunday in the Free Trade Hall. There was a larger attendance of both scholars and adults than there has been for several years past. The day was fine, and at least one additional school joined in the service. The preacher was the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., of Altrincham, whose address on "White Garments" admirably caught the attention of the children. Mr. Baker was the organist and Mr. Whittaker the conductor, and the singing of both hymns and anthems went with a swing. Altogether the service was one to be remembered, and was a proof that although so many people spend their Whit week away from home, the popularity of the Free Trade Hall Festival is still an event looked forward to with great interest.

Norwich.—The Young People's Annual Induction Service was held on Whit-Sunday evening. Four young men and four young women out of those who had attended the Sunday afternoon preparation classes decided to enter our Church, and were formally welcomed by the minister. This is one of the most inspiring and helpful services of the year.

Peckham.—A sale of work, arranged by Miss Carter and Mr. G. Griffin, was held in the school-room of Avondale-road Church on Saturday, June 6, in connection with the Sunday Scholars' Guild. After a hymn and prayer, the opening ceremony was conducted by Mrs. Bredall, who gave a charming little address of encouragement, at the close of which a bouquet of flowers was presented by the youngest member of the Guild. There was not a large attendance, but the financial result was very satisfactory.

Richmond.—As at Shrewsbury a fortnight ago, the Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., and Mrs. Crooker were the preachers morning and evening at the Ormond-road Free Church on Sunday. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. S. Farrington, and Mrs. Crooker's sermon was from Acts xxvi. 19: "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision." It was an earnest exposition of the constant inspirations of the higher life granted in successive ages to the world, and in many forms, as in the great champions of freedom, the leaders of reform and philanthropy, and higher education and the enlightenment of a liberal theology.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe. — Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday week, and in the evening of last Sunday. The scholars had been well trained for singing their hymns and anthem by Mr. W. R. Stevenson. There was a good attendance at all the services, which were conducted by Rev. A. H. Dolphin, and the offertory was slightly in excess of last year. Last Sunday afternoon a united service of Upper Chapel and Upperthorpe scholars was held at Upperthorpe. The service was conducted by Rev. A. H. Dolphin, and Rev. J. E. Jenkins gave the address. About 400 scholars were present.

Sheffield (Upper Chapel).—The usual Whitsuntide treat for the Sunday-school was held at Fox's pastures, Lightwood, the scholars (numbering 344, including 80 from Attercliffe Mission) being driven from Channing Hall in waggons and drays. After tea, prizes for the sports, the gift of the Master Cutler and Mr. M. J. Hunter, were distributed by Mrs. J. E. Jenkins. The day was greatly enjoyed.

South Cheshire and District Association.—The annual meeting was held at Nantwich on Wednesday, May 27th. The congregations and schools represented at the gathering were Chester, Crewe, Knutsford, Nantwich, Newcastle, Shrewsbury, and Whitchurch. The business meeting was held in the afternoon under the presidency of the Rev. J. C. Street. The Committee's report stated that the statistics showed an increase, both in the total number of teachers and scholars—from 52 to 56, and from 374 to 420—and it was further satisfactory to find that there had been a gain in each school making a return to the Association, and that good, steady work was being done. The Committee recorded with very great regret that at the conclusion of the Rev. R. S. Redfern's ministry at Crewe, both the school and church were closed by the Liverpool District Association. The hope was expressed that at no distant date an earnest attempt would be made to re-organise the work in Crewe. The Treasurer's financial statement showed a small balance in hand. The reports and balance were adopted on the motion of the president, seconded by the Rev. G. A. Payne.

A vote of thanks was passed to the retiring officers, who were unanimously re-elected for the ensuing year.

A very cordial welcome was offered to the Rev. W. R. Shanks as representing the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and Mr. Shanks in the course of an interesting reply conveyed the greetings of his Association to the meeting.

It was decided to hold the autumnal meeting at Knutsford and the next annual meeting at Whitchurch. Tea was served in the schoolroom at five o' clock, and advantage was taken of the arrival of Rev. C. Roper, to thank him for so kindly consenting to preach the annual sermon. After tea a considerable number of the party, under the leadership of Mr. W. Vickery, paid a visit to Willaston, and by the courtesy of the Head Master—Mr. Guy Lewis—were shown over the magnificently-equipped school buildings. At seven o'clock divine service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. C. Roper, B.A., who preached an extremely interesting sermon from the text "The streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing."

A collection was taken at the close on behalf of the funds of the Association.

Windermere.—The Secretary of the Missionary Conference reports that the first of the summer services will be held in the Albert Hall, Cross-street, Windermere, on Sunday morning, June 21, at eleven o'clock, when the Rev. J. Channing Pollard, of Lancaster, will be the preacher. The services will be continued into September. The assistance of volunteers to play for the singing will be gladly welcomed.

The Snnday School Conference of the Irish Non-subecribing Association was held at Ballycarry on Saturday, June 6, when a paper on "Catechisms" was read by the Rev. D. Walmsley. A report of the Conference we shall publish next week.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—A. O. A.; A. N. B.; G. B.; E. C.; J. E. C.; J. D.; M. D.; R. B. D.; A. C. F.; ,L. O. H.; S. J. H.; J. A. G.; R. McG.; C. R.; R. R.; C. J. S.; H. B. S.; J. C. S.; R. R. S. (Multan); J. H. W.; W. W.

THE BIBLE IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

BY

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.,

Lecturer on the History of Religion, Manchester College, Oxford.

"There is probably no single book in existence, of at all the same size, which can tell so much of the development of inquiry and of the men and the causes which furthered it. . . . We welcome Mr. Carpenter's noble zeal for truth, and thank him for a volume which will be a valuable element in the education of many."—Daily News.

"The book is hardly perhaps for specialists, it is intended rather for the layman who desires to make a serious study of these matters, and to him it may be recommended as giving, from a somewhat advanced point of view, a more instructive resume of the history and results of modern criticism of the Bible than is to be found elsewhere in English."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Carpenter's book will probably remain the standard work on its subject. Here we have presented in readable form the whole history of Biblical criticism down to our own day; and as that criticism is in its main results a settled thing, there is no reason why its history should ever be re-written."—Daily Chronicle.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Lord Mayor has issued a further appeal on behalf of the Hospital Sunday Fund. Last Sunday's collections unfortunately were "half-ruined" by the deplorable weather, and the Lord Mayor appeals to clergymen and ministers in London to ask to-morrow that those members of their congregations who could not be presentlast Sunday may send their conbutions either to their minister or direct to the Mansion House.

THE bi-centenary of the birth of John Wesley was celebrated on Wednesday. At Epworth, his birthplace, there was a representative Methodist gathering, when a sermon was preached in the Wesley Memorial Chapel by the Rev. C. H. Kelly, and in the evening a public meeting was held. In London, the celebration of the day began early, with a Love Feast at seven o'clock in the morning at Wesley's Chapel, City-road. At an afternoon service, the Rev. W. L. Watkinson was the preacher, and at the evening meeting, over which Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., presided, six of the various sections of Methodists were represented, and an enthusiastic united demonstration was held, not without utterance of some earnest aspirations after re-union. Of Wesley's work and Methodism in connection with the bi-centenary, we have spoken in another column.

BY a series of ruthless murders a revolution was last week effected by the Army in Servia, the King and Queen being shot in the Palace at Belgrade by a company of officers in the first hour of Thursday morning, the Queen's two brothers and several of the chief officers of State being also among the victims of the plot. Thus the Obrenovitch family is wiped out, and the throne is left to the rival house of Karageorgevitch. Prince Peter, of that house, has been unanimously elected King, and has been congratulated by both Russia and Austria. He has accepted the throne as vouchsafed to him "by God's mercy," and in a solemn service of thanksgiving in the cathedral at Belgrade the aged Metropolitan has thanked the Army for what has been done. Sensational reports of revolting brutality which accompanied the murders have been widely circulated, but the special commissioner of the Daily News, who arrived in Belgrade on Sunday morning, and whose letter was published on Thursday, put the action of the conspirators in a better light, and justified the revolution, if not the murders, as required by the best interests of the country, which include the restoration of a Liberal constitution. Yet one seems to be carried back by such an occurrence into a barbarism which we had supposed to be a thing of the past, at least in civilised Europe. One most astonishing thing is the reported callous indifference of the people, while the repeated invocations of divine sanction cast a lurid light upon the "Christianity" of the successful revolutionists.

THE gravity of the "Passive Resistance" movement shows increasingly from week to week. Overseers and rate-collectors declare their sympathy with the resisters, and some appear willing to run any risks rather than execute their duty under the present law. And this spirit is now manifested on the Bench, a magistrate having declined to take action in cases of refusal to pay the rate. Of course, the Government of Mr. Balfour and Lord Halsbury would not stickle about short ways to deal with recalcitrant justices of the peace; but we can imagine the Prime Minister, in the midst of tariff inquiries and Irish Land Bill troubles, echoing the patriarch's lament, "All these things are against me." Speculation is rife, whether, after all, the London Education Bill can be passed, now that the cordial understanding between Irish members and the Government has been broken. But we can have no doubt that it is sincerely meant to be enacted, and all of us who oppose it must do so with unabated energy.

WE called attention last year to the invaluable pioneer work done by Miss Mary Dendy, as hon. secretary of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-minded; and are glad to hear from Miss Dendy, in the letter which will be found in our present issue, how well the work has prospered. We trust that her plea for further financial aid will meet with abundant response.

NOT only Londoners, but all who are interested in temperance reform should watch with interest the experiment of Mr. Charrington on the island he has purchased off the Essex coast in the estuary of the Blackwater, five miles from Maldon, forty miles from London. Osea is a little island a mile and a half long and half a mile broad; on it Mr. Charrington purposes to build a convalescent home in connection with his Mile-End Mission, and to make opportunity for building cottages and houses which shall all be beautiful, healthy, and attractive. But it is to be a prohibition island; no intoxicant is to be sold there. Though not prepared to undertake the building of an inebriate home himself, Mr. Charrington looks for the establishment of one, and wishes the place to be one in which temperance reformers may try their schemes for reclaiming drunkards, the exceptional advantages being that they have "a mile or two of salt water between them and the nearest public-house."

AMONG the beneficent work undertaken by the Manchester University Settlement in Ancoats, the care of crippled men, women, and children especially appeals to the warm sympathy of many friends. Within the district, over a hundred of these stricken human beings have been found and befriended. They are known as the "Santa Finas," and have their monthly gathering, in winter at the Art Museum, which is the home of the Settlement, where they are entertained and cared for, and in the summer months in the gardens or grounds of friends who invite them, taken thither in omnibuses, wagonettes, and cabs. The amount of thought and service required from the healthy in organising and carrying out the arrangements for these parties is very great, but so complete and genuine is the kindness of the workers, and so able the management, that the sad sight of some hundred deformed people brought together is relieved, and even transfigured into a scene of beauty, by the tenderness of willing service and the unaccustomed brightness in the sufferers' faces. What one finds is a "Christian" gathering of people of many churches and none. A stalwart, broad-backed young journalist is playing cricket with limping boys, and some of the fielding is done on crutches.

A literary lady is giving rides about the grounds in a bath chair to some who cannot move of themselves. Young fellows are at hand to lift and carry the incapable. Ministering women seem to enjoy the company of the weaker folks whom they tend and talk to. The spirit is right; it is the spirit that could reform the whole world.

MESSRS. LEVER BROTHERS have made another gift to the inhabitants of their model village, Port Sunlight. An open-air theatre was declared open by the Mayor of Bolton, on Saturday, June 13, Mr. W. H. Lever presiding. Mr. Lever explained that the provision of this place of amusement was a continuation of his firm's method of giving a bonus to their work-people. They have already provided a large proportion of their employees with beautiful and healthy homes, rent free, while continuing to pay trades union rates of wages, and have provided the village with handsome schools, halls, baths, and other public buildings. At the new theatre, arrangements have been made for various entertainments furnished in a large measure by the villagers themselves. Those which are already announced aim at little more than innocent amusement, but it is expected that eventually Shakespearean plays and other educational and elevating entertainments will be arranged. The stage is under cover; the orchestra is almost beneath the footlights; the open-air auditorium consists of a flat rectangular area with a stepped gallery on three sides, accommodating in all about three thousand people.

COR HUMANUM.

IF raven-locked I hardly care,
Or if her eyes were blue;
I reck not if her face were fair,
Or if her figure true.

I know her heart was rich with love,
Her nature brave and strong,
And this ten years suffice to prove
In a dim world of wrong.

She knelt beside her mother's knee
Her evening prayer to say;
"Thank God," she prayed, "for bringing me
Safe through another day.

"Preserve me through the coming night,
And bless——" a pause, a sob;
Round mother's neck small arms wind tight,
Small pulses wildly throb.

"I cannot leave him out, mother,
Whatever you may say;
I cannot leave him out, mother,
Or else I cannot pray!"

Then brightening to a doubtful smile
As tears allowed, she cried,
"Thank God I had him for a while,
My daddy, ere he died."

"Thank God he was so kind, so dear,
And I may love him still."
Then passed without a break or tear
To prayers for Kate and Will.

'Tis ever thus for human heart,
However Thought may doubt;
As one by one our friends depart
We "cannot leave them out."

EMERSON NOTES.

THE Literary Supplement to the Times of May 29 opened with an elaborate and extremely interesting centenary article on Emerson, by a correspondent writing from New York on May 13. The correspondent had known Emerson both at home and in this country. He speaks of himself as having been brought up among the Massachusetts Whigs ("the American analogue of the British Tory"), and his family were shocked at his having anything to do with the radical heretic; but while he was a law-student at Harvard, he heard Emerson lecture in Boston, and William Emerson (a nephew) was his fellow student. So it came about that on Emerson's invitation the two young men spent a week-end with him at Concord. "When you had once passed through that doorway into his presence, life was never again to be to you quite the same thing as before. There was a new earth and a new heaven—perhaps a new divinity. Emerson's influence might totally fail to reach you, but if it reached you it became an inspiration." Then follows a description of Emerson's unaffected frankness and simplicity, and his genuine interest in the young men. And the writer continues:—

Then he proposed a walk, and took me through the famous Concord woods, and discoursed of Nature, of Thoreau, "who came closer to her than most of us do." But every word he said betrayed his own intimacy, not only with Nature in the large sense, but with details: with trees and birds and all the rest. He was at home in the woods, but did not insist that you should prefer them to the houses. In London society, many years after this, he seemed equally at home, but always with the air of one assisting at a spectacle which he understood yet still was a spectacle. So much of it as was artificial he thought trivial; then, as ever, he sought for what was essential; and he rejoiced in meeting, not only men and women of distinction, but any man or any woman in whom he could discover character or high qualities. In the Concord woods, in his own home, in a London house, on the platform of the Music-hall in Boston, dreaming aloud to 3,000 people, he was the same Emerson, with the same manner—kindly, yet remote, profoundly concerned with whatever was human, yet never distant in thought from those celestial spaces in which his soul roamed freely and far.

The writer, who was one of the many young Americans who came to this country with an introduction from Emerson to Carlyle, places a very high estimate on the debt which his countrymen owe to him.

The beauty in Emerson's thought, like that in his life, does not lend itself readily to analysis. Our inheritance in him is more than a legacy in this or that department of intellectual effort. The political lesson of this Republic in its origin and in its growth is, above all others, the lesson of independence. The American venerates Jefferson as the author of the Declaration of Independence—that "passionate manifesto of a revolutionary war," as it came later to be described. He venerates Lincoln as the author of emancipation, the second great lesson of American history, outside of the Constitution. And to Emerson he now looks up as the third of this triumvirate—as the thinker who taught him intellectual independence, and from whom came to him, more than from any other single benefactor, the inestimable gift of spiritual emancipation.

A CENTENARY article on Emerson, full of warm appreciation of his genius and character, appears in the May number of Macmillan. Of the character of New England's greatest seer, the writer speaks in the following terms:—

Emerson, by his nature and disposition, came near to realising that perfection which is at once the ideal and the goal of humanity. It has been said that we must go back to Spinoza before we can find another character to compare to his in its startling purity and self-fidelity. We are lost in admiring wonder while viewing the aerial height to which he attained, and we search in vain for some flaw in his character, some trifling indiscretion, that would assure us that after all he really was a man like ourselves. In all the relationships of life he was never found wanting. As son, husband, father or citizen, his conduct responds to our expectations. He was the ideal of a friend, and, beautifully as he has written on the subject of friendship, he has thrown his writings into the shade by his noble practice. No man had truer, more generous and beautiful relations with his literary contemporaries.

What Emerson thought of England and Englishmen may be read in his "English Traits." The writer of this article quotes an eloquent passage from the Manchester speech of November, 1847, and asks us to ponder it in the light of our self-knowledge to-day. Then he turns to the quality of Emerson's teaching:—

"A great interpreter of life ought not himself to need interpretation," says John Morley, and Emerson certainly does not need an interpreter, charged though he may be by some readers with obscurity. For the "pungent and unforgettable truths" he utters are drawn from the bed-rock of our primary emotions, and are self-affirming. His view of life was that of the healthy man. The development of the body must go hand in hand with the expansion of the mind; the cultivation of the heart must accompany the training of the intellect. Emerson was the master of "living well," and, as he said, it requires as much breadth of power to succeed in this as it does to win laurels in the State, or the army, or the bar, or any other function to which man may set his hand. When we examine his writings we are amazed at the fertility of illustration, the wealth of imagery, with which every essay is crowded; and of Emerson we can say he saw life steadily and whole.

DR. CROOKER, since his arrival in this country, has not only preached the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Little Portland-street Chapel, but has already occupied two other of our historic pulpits, that of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, as we reported at the time, and on the following Sunday that of the Shrewsbury Church. At Shrewsbury Mrs. Crooker also preached in the evening; and again to-morrow (Sunday) at the Richmond Free Church, Ormond-road. Dr. Crooker is to preach at the morning service and Mrs. Crooker in the evening.

Too often has the hopeful, sunny-spirited leader of Galilee been painted only as "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." Jesus must have been naturally joyous-hearted, and full always of a sublime hope and earnestness.

—James H. West.

RECENT HELPS TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.*

PROBABLY most of our readers know that Delitzsch's lectures have caused a great stir in Germany, and have become the occasion of a controversy in which a considerable number of eminent scholars have taken part. He has been criticised by Biblical critics of the first rank such as Budde, Cornill, Kittell, Sellin, as also by at least two experts in Assyrian research viz., Hommel and Jensen. The German Emperor himself has taken part in the fray, and a vigorous protest has been made by men engaged in pastoral work and by the ecclesiastical journals, Catholic and Protestant. We cannot but think that the Biblical scholars and Assyriologists are wholly right in the objections they have raised. We have on the other hand little sympathy with the position taken by the extreme conservatives, nor had we any idea that the strength of this party was still so great in Germany. Whatever opinion we may hold on these points, it cannot be wise to forget that Delitzsch has given in popular and attractive form a really admirable summary of the contributions which Assyriology has made to the study of the Old Testament. First, then, we shall speak of the indisputable matter which occupies nearly the whole of the two lectures. Afterwards we shall have something to say on the statements which have aroused opposition and which are, as we believe, questionable in the highest degree.

What has Assyriology done for the Bible? Sixty years ago the Hebrew records were our oldest authority for the history of Western Asia, and our knowledge of it began with the Hebrew exodus from Egypt, say, in the fourteenth century B.C. Now we can trace the ordered and civilised existence of the Semites in Babylonia as far back as 3,700 years before our era, and behind this is another civilisation far more ancient, though how ancient no one can tell as yet, the civilisation of a non-Semitic people from which the Semites borrowed their script with much of their religion and their science. From the third millennium B.C. we have an elaborate code of law by Hammurabi, who is most likely the Amraphel of Genesis xiv. The Tel-el-Amarna tablets throw a flood of light on the state of Canaan from 1500 to 1400 B.C., i.e., in all probability before the main Hebrew immigration thither, and prove that its cities must have been for long familiar with the Babylonian language, Babylonian writing, Babylonian ideas. The Hebrew accounts of the creation and flood are in their framework of Babylonian origin, and the germ of the Hebrew Sabbath also came apparently from the same people. Places famous in Bible story, e.g., Ur, which was Abraham's early home, have been probably identified. We can look on a portrait statue of Sargon, who is mentioned in Isaiah, but who was till yesterday a mere name. Instead of the artificial and contradictory chronology which prevails in the Hebrew books of Kings, we now have a Babylonian chronology which can be checked by its reference to eclipses, which is consistent and intelligible, and which, as kings of Israel and Judah from Omri onwards are mentioned in the Assyrian annals, enables us to fix the chief dates in the Bible records. Our days of the week, the signs of the Zodiac, the system of weights and measures current not only in Israel but also in Greece, are also due to Babylon. This, and much more than this, may be read in Delitzsch's pages. The information they give is not new and is, we suspect, much more familiar to English people than to Germans who are not Biblical scholars by profession. Still it is put with admirable clearness, and in a most attractive way.

It is a pity, we think, that controversial matter should have been introduced at all, but it is, of course, perfectly true that Assyrian research makes it unreasonable to believe in the verbal inspiration of the Old Testament. The Old Testament contains, as we have seen, myths borrowed from heathen sources. The historical statements of the Bible are often confirmed, but often also corrected and modified by cuneiform inscriptions. So far we have no serious quarrel with the ground Delitzsch takes.

But it is quite another matter when he contends that the ethical monotheism of the Hebrew prophets was anticipated by the Babylonians. What is the proof of this? To begin with, Delitzsch lays stress on the word for God (El) common to Assyrian and Hebrew. He takes it to mean "the goal," He to whom men's eyes turn, for whom they long, exposed as they are to the changes and chances of this mortal life. Now he gives no hint that this etymology is one of about five which have been advocated by modern scholars, and by no means either the most likely or the most widely accepted. Next he produces a brick from the British Museum inscribed with characters which, as he admits, are "scarcely legible." He reads "Jahve is God," a reading which is contested by Assyriologists quite as competent as Delitzsch, and which he himself no longer considers more than highly probable. The matter is of no great importance; it is the character, not the name of Jehovah which concerns us. No doubt, it would be highly significant if, as Delitzsch assumes, Jahve is equivalent to "the existent," "the permanent." But it cannot for a moment be assumed that this interpretation, though supported by the Pentateuch, is admirable. The God who blows (in the wind), or, again, the God who casts down (lightning, hail, &c.), are interpretations far more likely, and in any case Delitzsch's opinion may be safely dismissed as antiquated. Another text in which, as Delitzsch reads it, Marduk, the god of light, is identified with other deities, Bel, Nebo, &c., goes a very little way to establish a theory of Semitic monotheism. Such pantheistic unification was carried much further in Egypt and had no real influence on popular worship. Here again the reading of the cuneiform text is disputed. We cannot enter into the controversy, which must be fought out by experts. In any case the religion of the Babylonians and Assyrians remained by Delitzsch's own confession "a crass polytheism," and he must be a timid believer who fears that the unique glory of Hebrew revelation will be wounded by such blunt weapons as these.

We have already spoken of Hammurabi's code, and Mr. Johns has provided the English public with a translation. The King of Babylon professed to have received those statutes from the sun-god. The translation stands in urgent need of a commentary, for a good deal is hard to comprehend. We should like to know, for instance, what is meant by "a woman who is a votary." The form of the statutes reminds one of the Hebrew "book of the Covenant" (Exod. xx.–xxiii.). In substance the two codes are very different. The Babylonian lawgiver presupposes a state of things in which the tribal system has entirely disappeared. There is scarcely any trace of the blood-revenge which lingered among the Hebrews, though it was modified and restrained during the whole of their history. Everything at Babylon seems to have been subject to the king's judges. There are minute regulations on the price of commodities, on rent, on the hire of boats and ships, on surgeon's fees, &c., &c. The enactments are sanguinary, e.g., unjust appropriation of lost property, detaining fugitive slaves, theft at a fire, allowing seditious brawling in a wine-shop were capital crimes. There is little or no reference to religion, though in cases of doubtful evidence litigants have to make an oath "before God." But there are laws against witchcraft, and ordeal by throwing "into the holy river" is recognised, e.g., in the case of a wife suspected without definite evidence. On the whole the position of women is well maintained, and the custom by which a childless wife gave her own maid to bear children by the husband was common to Babylonians and Hebrews.

A few words must suffice for the last book on our list. It is not critical, for though the author is aware that the books of Samuel are composed of different documents, he is so unwilling to part with any picturesque detail that he attempts to reconcile hopeless contradictions. He also gives far too free rein to a fancy which is characteristically French. How does he know that Bathsheba was "a born actress, a consummate tragedian," or that "billowy tresses fell in dark splendour over the ivory fairness of her young beauty," or that Uriah was "a sword turned into a man, with the tenderness of a bar of iron and the soul of an instrument of war"? At the same time the book is worth reading. It shows sympathetic insight into David's extraordinary genius, that union of courage, statesmanship, chivalrous generosity, poetic inspiration, attractive power, which made him the darling hero of Israel. It is a good book to put into the hands of young people, though it contains not a little which they will have to unlearn.

Since writing the above we have received a translation of Delitzsch's lectures by a very competent Assyrian scholar, Mr. C. W. Johns, of Queen's College, Cambridge. This work is published by Williams and Norgate, and forms part of the "Crown Theological Library." It appears in a most attractive form and reproduces the beautiful and instructive woodcuts which are a prominent feature in the original. In his introduction Mr. Johns, as it seems to us, seriously underrates the weight of the opposition offered toDelitzsch. It is not only extreme conservatives but Old Testament critics of the highest reputation and independence who have deprecated his reckless generalisations. Some of these points have been indicated above. Even when Delitzsch avoids positive error with regard to the Old Testament, his statements are apt to be one-sided and so misleading. Is it fair, for instance, to dwell on the inferior position of the Hebrew woman on the value assigned to her for "purposes of work," and to ignore the far higher view which prevails, e.g., throughout the book of Proverbs and culminates in the noble acrostic in praise of the good wife? or to urge the particularist and national character of Hebrew religion without taking account of the wider outlook revealed to the prophets and especially to the unknown author of Isaiah xl.–lv.? The fact is that Delitzsch's knowledge of the Old Testament is neither exact nor profound, as his recent translation of Job proves. At the same time we may well be grateful to Mr. Johns for making Delitzsch's lectures accessible to English readers. We agree most heartily and unreservedly with the concluding words of his introduction:—

The men of deep religious faith, who alone count for the progress of the race, will rejoice and take it as a fresh proof that the Father has never left Himself without witness among men, and that even the most unlikely elements have gone to prepare the world for Him who was, and still is, to come.

WESLEY AGAIN.*

THIS is the kind of book to make one ask whether the responsibility of sending forth another volume into the bookshops is not sometimes undertaken too lightly. You go into a shop with a few shillings in your pocket wishing to exchange them for some helpful and edifying book to give a young friend. Here it is, you say, just the thing: nice looking volume, well-known publishers, not a very high price, some excellent portraits, a remarkable history, too, that it will do young people good to read. What could be more suitable? Hardly anything if it were what you suppose. But I have looked into it, and read it, and I assure you that it is not a history at all. Whether the author really meant it to be a history is doubtful; there is no preface, and he may not have understood the title in the sense which you and I naturally attach to it. It is very probable, sadly probable, that your young friend would like the book. For your young friend takes Tit-Bits and reads the Strand Magazine, you say. Very well. This book abounds in good anecdotes, and curious bits of information, and interesting discussions. And then, again, look at the portraits. There is a very excellent one of Mrs. Susannah Wesley, John Wesley's mother, marked carefully, "to face page 57." That page opens the third chapter, which contains, indeed, nothing about Mrs. Wesley; but it contains John Wesley's meeting with Whitefield, John Wesley's temporary misunderstanding with Whitefield on account of doctrinal differences, Wesley's relations with the Moravians, various kinds of difficulty and opposition that Wesley met with; all of which Susannah Wesley would have been interested in if she had known the circumstances. Your young friend will like the book. But it will be your duty to send along with the volume a letter advising your friend that when he (or she) has read it through he will not know the history of Wesley and his work, but will only know that such history is accessible in other volumes. In "Southey's Wesley," in "Tyerman's Wesley," in the "'Journal' of John Wesley" (of which an excellent abridged edition has recently been issued), in various biographies of Wesley's co-workers and assistants, and especially in the life of the Rev. John Fletcher, of whom no mention is made in this volume, in "Green's History of England," and in Wesley's own Sermons that history may be learned. It would be possible within the compass of this volume (over 300 pages) to write a history of the Wesley movement on a small scale. That is not here attempted. What is given is a series of what one may call literary snapshots. We see Wesley, here and there, in many counties and in various sorts of company; we get glimpses of the manners and customs of the time in which Wesley lived. Odds and ends of fact with which Wesley was little concerned or totally unconcerned come up occasionally, and insist on being noticed. Hence we learn several times over that Dr. Johnson was short-sighted. Well, it is a sad and solemn fact; and though Johnson himself objected to have it mentioned, he is dead now, and we can speak of it as often as we wish. It should be added that when the author of this book speaks his own thoughts, when he forsakes the Wesley diaries and biographies, and utters himself as a man with a message to the world—he says something. The fifth chapter closes with these memorable words:—

Thus while at all times we may becomingly show interest in the days which have gone before, let us never show ourselves to be so lacking in judgment as to suppose that those old times were comparable to our own, as regards those things which we chiefly prize as rational and accountable beings. In the early days of the ninth decade of the century, when Wesley passed from the scenes of earth to pass into the full glory of the beatific vision, he had sowed the seed in the British Isles, which in our times would yield an abundant harvest. He is one of those blessed ones whose works follow, and who being dead yet speaketh.

Woe to the man who by adding further words would spoil the effect of those.

BOOKS for Sunday-schools are so often printed on poor paper and in small type, in order to keep them within the narrow limits that can be "afforded" for such things, that we are particularly glad to see Mr. Armstrong's "Pulpit Talks to Boys and Girls" brought out in a really attractive form as regards binding, paper, and print. The book is pleasant to see on the table, to hold in one's hand, and to read. Anyone who has to do with children, either in school or home, cannot do better than get it and read it to them—but not more than one address a week. Don't let it lie about to be dipped into, or to be taken up by the children and read till they weary of it. Bring it out and read one of the addresses, and talk about it, and put the book away till next week. And as for those who have no children about them, let them get it and read it to themselves when they want a few moments away from the grown-up world of every day.

The myths and legends that spring up in the childhood of nations will always appeal strongly to the children of a later day, and especially the children of a literary age such as ours; and this collection of addresses opens most aptly with Scandinavian mythology and Irish legend as moulded by two modern poets, Matthew Arnold and Tennyson, in their poems of "Balder Dead" and "The Voyage of Maeldune." In these there is narrative enough ready to the hand of any poet or preacher, and the story needs only to be told and its lesson pointed out.

The next two addresses are on subjects which are taken altogether from modern literature, for the verse of Genesis which tells of the inventions of Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal-cain cannot be said to be even the foundation, but only the suggestion of George Eliot's noble poem of "Jubal." The two subjects are George Eliot's "Jubal" and Browning's "Pippa Passes"; the birth, growth, and power of music and of genius devoted to some great purpose for man; and the saving influence of the music of a bright and innocent life.

The rest of the addresses are very varied in character, connected only by one golden thread of sympathy and cheerful faith that runs through them all. Every-day courage, cheerfulness, heroism, the possibility of a simple resolve "to be good" in no spirit of priggish self-assertion, but in a pure desire to fit oneself for one's own proper place in a world which is God's world, consideration for others, kindness to our dumb fellow creatures, these are the practical and religious lessons of Mr. Armstrong's little volume.

"The Making of Heroes," "Princess Drina," and "A Cheery Spirit," inculcate by example the virtues of our age, as the "Lives of the Saints" inculcated those of the Middle Ages. "Doth God care for Oxen?" and "May Day at Keswick" should stay many a thoughtless act of cruelty, and bring young readers or hearers of these addresses into intelligent and sympathetic relations with all the marvellous and beautiful life of nature and wild and domestic animals. And the concluding address, "Be Thou Faithful unto Death," will surely arouse a desire to know still more than it can tell in so short a space of those strong, true lives of the seventeenth century which laid the foundation of our churches in a reverent freedom of religious life.

THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE GRANTS FUND.

SIR,—The consideration of this subject has been referred to the Conference Committee, but it is desirable that public interest should be sustained in matters of so much importance, and I think there is a point which has not been openly discussed hitherto, though it can hardly have escaped the notice of careful students of the situation.

In addition to replacing the grants now made to the churches by the B. and F.U.A. —about £2,000 annually—the sums disbursed by those local societies which also bear the "doctrinal name" must be similarly provided for if the object is to be obtained which the President specified in his Liverpool address. The case of societies bearing a "mixed" name (e.g., Unitarian and Presbyterian) is not clear. They may be considered unobjectionable in the same way, apparently, that the National Conference is, notwithstanding the inclusion of "Unitarian" in its title. Some of our local grant-making societies omit this term altogether from their titles; others have adopted it without ecclesiastical co-ordinate. Such are the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, the London District Unitarian Society, the Southern Unitarian Association, the South Wales Unitarian Association, the South-East Wales Unitarian Society, the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association, and the Scottish Unitarian Association.

The funds raised by some of these are small, but in the aggregate they furnish a full half of the grants from local societies to the churches. With reference to Scotland, also, it must be remembered that its aided churches depend chiefly on the McQuaker Fund, the administration of which is by the will of the founder placed in the hands of the B. and F.U.A. It is clear that the Conference church list cannot be considered free of contact with the "doctrinal" name, so far as grants-in-aid are concerned, while this administration continues.

The most recent balance sheets of the local Unitarian societies with "unmixed" names show that the churches receive from them grants amounting annually to more than £1,900: of course, I omit the grants received through these societies from the B. and F. U.A. The McQuaker Fund may be credited with disbursements to churches (including building grants) of £600 a year. It is well within the mark, therefore, to say that, instead of the comparatively simple though still arduous task of getting rid of the B. and F.U.A. grants by a Fund of £50,000 plus the collections on "Association Sunday"—a doubtful asset, I fear—the problem is really much more complicated and difficult. Allowing the "collections" item to stand, and assuming the same rate of income from the Fund, the capital sum to be aimed at must be increased to over £130,000; and then, what to do with the superfluous "Unitarian" societies?

If we were studying chess we might consider the possible, though not hopeful, "move" of converting these doctrinally named local societies from the error of their ways, and so get rid of this formidable financial difficulty. But, with Mr. Wood, most of us are weary of this name-battle. With Mr. Wood also, we would rather see present societies strengthened than the creation of a vast new Central Fund. The B. and F.U.A. is just now rejoicing in a bountiful increase in its resources. Would it not be practical "business" to make the strengthening of all our local societies—whatever their style and title—the next great effort of our time? In this effort we should be all able to join, I hope, and the Conference Committee might lead the way. It is worthy of notice that two local societies, N. and E. Lancashire and the Yorkshire Union, are endeavouring to raise funds of £5,000 each during the year. We want similar enterprise all along the line. So long as our district associations are weak—and none are too strong, while the condition of some is simply deplorable—the whole work halts, in spite of both Conference and Association.

W. G. TARRANT.

THE DANGER OF TYRANNY.

SIR,—A few days hence I hope to sail to regions whither the dust of our domestic controversies cannot follow me. Moreover, I no longer occupy an official position which imposes upon me the duty of defending the British and Foreign Unitarian Association from what may seem to me injurious misstatements of fact. This, therefore, will be my last word of protest against the statement of Mr. Lummis. My sole purpose has been to ask him to substantiate or withdraw the statement that the Unitarian Association "has already grasped the reins of Church government." If he will look at my first letter, in the INQUIRER of May 23, he will see that this and this alone was my purpose, and that I expressly declined general controversy by newspaper letters on questions of policy now before our churches.

Mr. Lummis, however, now declares that this statement of his is a "minor point." I cannot so consider it. If the Association had really been guilty of the conduct imputed to it, I for one would never have consented to hold office in it. But it has not, and Mr. Lummis has failed to substantiate the allegation.

Mr. Lummis himself declares that to the best of his knowledge and belief the charge that the Association has ever abused its powers "would be at the opposite pole from the truth." It is hard to see how this admission can be reconciled with the charge that it has "grasped the reins of Church government." Nor does one quite perceive why, after a record for nearly eighty years which wins such a certificate of honourable abstention from Mr. Lummis, he should now see looming large before him "the danger of tyranny" from the Association.

Of the funds referred to by Mr. Lummis, all, save the McQuaker Trust, small and local, it appears that they have been placed under the administration of the Association, under strict trusts, by will or other instruments executed by the donors. It is difficult to see how the Association could have declined to act; and the confidence thus reposed in its executive in any case does not sustain the allegation that it has grasped the reins of Church government.

With regard to the funds of the other "paymasters," Mr. Lummis cannot charge me with inaccuracy. The Augmentation Fund and the Sustentation Fund divide the whole country between them, having a geographical line of demarcation clearly drawn. It is surely absurd to withhold the epithet "paymaster" from them, yet attach it to the Association, seeing that their united grants largely exceed those of the Association, and cover a very much greater number of ministers or congregations.

I am obliged to notice one other implication in Mr. Lummis's letter, not arising out of the original (and, in my intention, only) point of dispute. While I entirely disclaim any kind of pretension to be anyone's "leader," I must repudiate the suggestion that I have "abandoned" a position which I once "stalwartly defended." I have always refused to describe our churches as "Unitarian." I have always maintained their free catholicity. I do so to-day as zealously as ever. On the other hand, I have always believed in and supported an Association established to promote "the principles of Unitarian Christianity." I have approved of free and friendly offices between our churches and that Association, mutual helpfulness and goodwill, so long and so far as the congregations are so minded. If there is any change at all in my mind in regard to these things, it is simply this, that my year of office as President of the Unitarian Association has made me realise more vividly than I ever realised before, that there is an organic and natural relation between the principle of freedom and Unitarian Christianity.

Personally, I heartily desire the strengthening of our Free Catholic Churches (pace Mr. Warren); but I do not think that it will be promoted by ingratitude to an Association which has helped many of them through times of stress and strain; and I rejoice in the conviction that we all regard it with goodwill, Mr. Lummis as truly as any of us, even though expressions that fall from us sometimes disguise that feeling. I am sincerely sorry that illness deprived us of the presence and speech of Mr. Lummis at the late anniversaries. We look to him for much help and strength and counsel in the coming years.

RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG.

Liverpool, June 15, 1903.

THE DANGER OF TYRANNY.

SIR, It is, perhaps, unfortunatet hat the important controversy now being conducted in your columns should be carried on under this title. We are all, on both sides, so fully conscious that we have no desire to tyrannise that the suggestion implied in the use of the word naturally rouses some warmth of feeling and tends to confuse the issue.

That issue is really not whether any body of men at the present time do desire to tyrannise, but whether the system or organisation which they advocate would at some future time, and under the control of men of a different temperament and having different ideals, lend itself to tyranny or, to use a less objectionable phrase, undue influence.

It is possible to create an instrument which, in the hands of those who framed it and are conscious of its limitations and alive to its possible misuses, may be useful and harmless, but which, falling into other hands, may become the means to great mischief.

Such is the danger that some of us foresee as possible in connection with the Unitarian Association. While we have full confidence in the ability and wisdom of those who at present administer it, and in their loyalty to the great principles of freedom, we cannot see that there is any security that the great instrument which they are now creating will not some day pass into the hands of other men, who will take a different view of their duty. Such men might well consider that their primary duty was not to promote free and reverent thought on theological questions, but to uphold and foster a Unitarian theology as they happened to understand it. They would find themselves in the position of administering considerable funds for the benefit of needy churches, and they might naturally enough consider it to be their duty to see that those funds, collected under the Unitarian name for Unitarian purposes, were given only to churches which would accept that name and endorse a theology which might seem to be satisfactory. The churches are, many of them, miserably poor, and the temptation would be great. Is there anything in the constitution of the Unitarian Association to make such a state of things impossible; and is there not in human nature, especially in theological human nature, a good deal that tends to make it possible? There are, I think, earnest and influential men among us today who see no harm in affixing the name Unitarian to our churches; nay, who would wish to do so, and, in some cases, succeed in doing it. It is not necessary to go much farther to bring about such a state of things as I have suggested.

On the one hand, a powerful Association with money to distribute, organised under a name which at least admits of a definite doctrinal interpretation, and administered by men who conceived it to be their duty to emphasise the doctrinal position; on the other hand, a group of needy churches, too much accustomed to rely on external assistances—should we not have, to say the least of it, a favourable opportunity for undue influence? It may be said that the traditions of the Association are such as to preclude all dangers in this direction. The traditions are, no doubt, good, and would be helpful, but they are not binding, and would not be any great restrain upon men who were at once strong and narrow-minded.

There seems to be a curious vein of thought running through some of the utterances on this question. The principle of open trusts and absolute liberty is admitted; but it is, at the same time, suggested that we have pretty well got to the bottom of the matter, and that in Unitarianism the last word has been said. It is the old orthodox position with this qualification that you may safely leave the door open, not in the confident hope that fresh light and truth will come in, but because there is practically no danger that anything more will come in. And that being so, if, perchance, you forget to leave the door open, no great harm will be done.

Necessarily, we never can tell what the new light and truth will be. We can only be confident that to the open mind it will come in one form or another. To me it seems quite possible that the Unitarianism of to-day, if stereotyped and fastened upon our churches, may become as great an obstacle to the spiritual religion of the future as some of us feel that dogmatic Trinitarianism is now.

JOHN DENDY.

THE MINISTERS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

SIR,—Being a very recent comer into the ranks of the Unitarian ministry, it is with some diffidence that I write to you upon a subject that has primarily to do with the question of £ s. d., lest it might look as if cash considerations rather than conscientious convictions were the dominating motives leading to the renunciation of one denomination and the adoption of another. However, be this as it may, I cannot refrain from writing a few words to support and, if possible, strengthen the appeal made by the Rev. Francis Wood, in the INQUIRER of May 30, respecting the age limit of "The Ministers' Benevolent Society." No truly sincere man expects or even desires that the sacrifices he makes in breaking with his past in order that he may be loyal to the light shall be compensated by any benefits he may receive from sources like the one named. The one absorbing question when the crisis comes is not the question of gain or loss, important as that is, but the burning question of fidelity to God and to conscience at any cost. But when the step has been taken and a man has, thereby, cut himself off from several kindred aids and helps, and is proving his sincerity by doing his honest best to serve the church of his adoption, and that in many cases for a stipend considerably less than heretofore, it does seem, to say the least of it, an unexpected and arbitrary hardship to be debarred from the benefits of a society like the one in question because he had the misfortune to be two or three years beyond the age limit when the voice of duty bade him go forward. That the funds of the Ministers' Benevolent Society and all kindred funds should be very carefully fenced around is only just and reasonable. Yes, and that the life and the lot of those whose love of truth and fitness to teach the truth have been duly tested and approved should not be made unnecessarily hard, is also just and reasonable. And it seems to me that this age limit, by shutting a man out absolutely from the benefits of this society—when, in the judgment of the advisary committee and other authorities, his age, health, and strength, are no barriers to his being received into the ministry—certainly creates an additional and, it would seem from the wealth of the society, an entirely uncalled-for hardship. I therefore join with Mr. Wood in asking both the laymen and the ministers if this irksome limitation is in accordance with their will.

ROBERT MCGEE.

Keighley-road, Colne, June 9.

SIR,—Referring to the two letters which have recently appeared in your columns in reference to the age limit applicable on an application for election as a beneficiary member of this Society, it may interest many of your readers to know that I have already received a suggestion relating to this subject which will be reported at the next directors' meeting, and which, if adopted, will probably meet some of the objections raised to the present laws.

OBITUARY.

MRS. ALFRED LAWRENCE.

WE regret to have to record the death of Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, which occurred at her residence, 26, Kensington Palace Gardens, London, early on Saturday morning last, the 13th inst.; just two days after she had completed the sixty-fifth year of her age.

Mary Elizabeth Lawrence was the eldest surviving daughter of the late Henry Ridge, of Upper Clapton, and granddaughter of the well-known Unitarian minister, the Rev. Robert Aspland. She married, on October 27, 1858, Alfred Lawrence, third son of the late Alderman William Lawrence, and brother of the late Sir William and Sir James Clarke Lawrence, also of Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, Bart. Her eldest son, Alfred Henry Lawrence, died on November 15, 1900, but she leaves a son, Frederick William Pethick-Lawrence, and three daughters, namely, Ellen Mary, wife of the Rev. W. J. Davies, Miss Anne Jane Lawrence, and Miss Caroline Aspland Lawrence, also a sister, Miss Anna Sophia Ridge.

The interment took place on Wednesday last, the 17th inst., and was preceded by an impressive memorial service at Essex Church, in which members of the congregation had placed many beautiful white flowers. It was attended by a large concourse of mourners, including the relatives, the household servants, personal friends, members of the church, over fifty members of the mothers' meeting, and representatives from various associations. The Provincial Assembly was represented by the Rev. F. Allen (secretary); the British and Foreign Unitarian Association by Mr. Oswald Nettlefold (treasurer), and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant; the London District Unitarian Society by the Rev. J. E. Stronge (secretary). Numerous floral wreaths bore witness to the wide and deep regard in which Mrs. Lawrence was held, those from the mothers' meeting and the choir of the church being especially conspicuous.

The service was conducted by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, who, after reading a few Scripture passages, spoke as follows :—

"We have gathered together into this place to bid our earthly adieux to one who was very dear to us, one who, within but a few days past, moved amongst us as a familiar presence, and whose absence leaves a sense of loss beyond the reach of words to express.

"This simple memorial service is held at the wish of the church of which Mrs. Alfred Lawrence was one of the most attached and truly beloved members, in order that we may pay our affectionate tribute to her memory, and offer our united sympathy to her family. From the days when this congregation met for worship in Essex-street, and through its intermediate ten years interval in the previous chapel, and through its sixteen years again in this present building, she was one of its most faithful supporters and constant attenders. Morning and evening service always found her in her place. And, during all these years, she grew ever dearer to the hearts of the old friends who had known her longest, and the new friends whom she admitted always with such readiness to her heart and to her house. Hospitality like hers was a blessedness to experience, a memory to cherish. Her heart and home were most warmly open to those who could render no return, lonely ministers from distant country chapels, visitors to London meetings, teachers from the school belonging to this church. She was one of those sermon-on-the-mount Christians, who give and who love, asking for nothing again.

"To the poor she was a true friend and benefactor, and by none will she be mourned with deeper sorrow, as I know from their grief and their presence here. For she was their Dorcas in good deeds, a mother herself to her large mothers' meeting, but without any tinge of patronage or pride of station. She drew no dividing lines, and she was always the same, never spoke ill of anyone, worked easily with others, and was so easy to work with herself; never put herself into the front place, dignified life's lowly duties, did the ittle kindnesses which most leave undone, or despise, spread thankfulness and peace, gave herself, her means, her sympathies with that—

> Graciousness in giving that doth make
> The small'st gift greatest, and a sense most meek
> Of worthiness, that doth not fear to take
> From others, but which always fears to speak
> Its thanks in utterance, for the giver's sake:
> The deep religion of a thankful heart,
> Which rests instinctively in Heaven's clear law
> With a full peace, that never can depart
> From its own steadfastness.

"And thus she was so helpful and peaceful an influence amongst us; her interest was so assured and accepted; we took her, I fear, so much for granted that it is only as we now look back on her tranquil life and her trustful work that her virtues claim the homage which she was the very last to claim for herself. I seem to hear her own voice rebuking us for saying even this, and for ascribing to her qualities which she did not consciously possess.

"Ah, yes, she was a beautiful example of that old-fashioned, domestic, modest piety, now, alas! so rare, which found its daily nurture in family prayer, and led her to cherish with tenderest reverence the precious sanctities, the hallowing memories, the sacred associations that cluster round religion and worship and the church. She had a holy awe of holy things. She was so loyal to the deepest religious impressions of her earlier days under the ministry of the Rev. Charles Berry, at Leicester; and if she had any family pride, it was that she was a granddaughter of the Rev. Robert Aspland.

"There is a phrase often quoted, 'of the dead say nothing but good'; but of her, surely, there was nothing but good to say. There was nothing behind her transparent simplicity, her patent sincerity, for she suspected nobody and she believed the best of everybody.

"And there is a thing called fame, a thirst for position and reputation, a craving for celebrity which is the besetting temptation of so many. It is the sweet opposite of that which we commemorate in her to-day. In a restless age of confusions and theories, of straining after vain ambitions and loud success, she was gently, patiently content to keep a quiet heart and to live the quiet life. And so, though not unacquainted with care, though accepting her duties of wife, mother, widow, her days pursued their even tenor, she trusted in God, and her children rose up to call her blessed.

"She loved much and was much beloved. She made us better by her presence; she has left us the heritage of a tendet, memory, which, like her immortal spirit, shall not die. God be praised that she has lived amongst us; God be thanked that her end was peace."

The hymn, "Hand in hand with Angels," was sung before the address, and, afterwards, "God giveth quietness at last." The whole congregation stood at the close during the playing of the Dead March.

The interment took place in the family vault at Kensal Green.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IN the year 1743 there lived a little girl named Barbara. Her parents were very respectable people, but, from misfortune or mismanagement, had become extremely poor; indeed, the family were almost starving. Barbara's little earnings were almost the only thing they had to live upon. In those days there was nothing to oblige parents to send their children to school; and little Barbara, who was still only ten years old, and had two little younger sisters, was employed in the theatre, at first only in the choruses, or where children were wanted to fill up the scenes. But, as she was very diligent and clever in doing her little parts, the manager soon let her learn and act whole parts in little plays, and of this she was very proud.

One evening, in some little play in which she was acting, there was a scene where she had to sup off a roast fowl ("O, joy to Barbara!") Poor hungry little girl, how she reckoned on it! But the man who was acting with her threw over the dish such a quantity of salt ("O, grief and pain of heart to Barbara!") that when she put some of it into her mouth she was obliged to sputter it out; and what with shame at her bad acting, and the hungry child's pain and disappointment at missing such a dainty, her little heart sobbed almost to breaking, and was relieved by a flood of tears, which the spectators could not understand.

Well, this good little half-starved girl stood one Saturday before the paymaster of the theatre, to receive her weekly pay, which was always a half-guinea. He was a careless old man, and this week, by mistake, he slipped a whole guinea instead into Barbara's hand. She did not notice it at first; but when she got downstairs as far as the first landing, she became conscious of an unusual weight in her hand, and there lay the guinea!

She was naturally a good child, but she had been taught nothing about right and wrong; she had never known temptation, and always thought of honesty as belonging to grown-up people.

Her first impulse was to go back to the old man and explain his mistake. But all in a flash came other thoughts. Would he miss it? And he was so good-natured! And then came an image of a better dinner and more meat next day at home; and then of her little sisters who had no shoes and stockings; she looked at her own neat shoes and stockings which her place at the theatre obliged her to wear, and longed to cover their poor feet too; and she thought how then they could go to the rehearsals with her, which their poor clothes had till now made impossible; and with these thoughts she passed down to the second landing.

And then somehow, without knowing how, for she never felt her feet to move, she found herself standing by the old man's desk again, and putting the guinea into his hand. He exchanged it for a half-guinea without a word; he had been quite unconscious of his mistake, and knew nothing of the minutes which had passed, which to Barbara were anxious ages. "And from that moment a deep peace fell upon her heart, and she knew the quality of honesty."

A year or two of industry "brightened up the feet, and the prospects, of her little sisters, and set the whole family upon their legs again." Barbara was heard to say that it was "a surprise not much short of mortification" to her to see the coolness with which the old man pocketed the guinea which had caused her such a struggle.

Long years after, when Barbara had been a great actress, and was an old woman, she had still kept the scrawled copies of the parts she had had given her to learn and act as a child, each of them separately bound up in costly morocco binding with fine clasps; and they were precious to her as a remembrance of those old days.

This little story is told by Charles Lamb in one of his volumes of essays, from which I have taken it. Next week I think you would like to hear something about the writer himself. GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

LONDON, JUNE 20, 1903.

JOHN WESLEY.

IT is two hundred years since that great man, whose name is still so familiar to us all, was born into this world, at Epworth, June 17 (old style), 1703. When we wish to see his monument, we have simply to look about us. Hardly are we able to get out of the reach of Methodist churches, chapels, mission houses, schools, &c.; and never, perhaps do we, as long as we are among English-speaking people, get quite beyond the influence of Methodism. God spake, through the instrumentality of John Wesley, and the thing was done; He commanded, and it stood fast. As Wesley himself never had the slightest doubt about the work given him to do; as he was so serenely confident on the subject that he never felt bound to argue the matter, but could take for granted that whoever was trying to suppress him had either made a mistake or was doing a wicked thing; so we can never doubt the reality of the good work he did, or the change which he effected in the lives and thoughts of the people.

It was from the beginning a change from dull inapprehension to lively perception, from spiritual stupidity to spiritual sense and life. When, in his Oxford days, Wesley first perceived that with most of the students and dons of his time the precepts of Christianity had become a dead letter; that hardly a soul realised the awful contrast between religion as taught in the New Testament and the formularies of the Church, and religion as feebly exemplified in the lives of professing Christians, he had already received his call. From the time that he and a few others began to live more strictly and to demand that others should do so, there was the beginning of Methodism, the Methodism that fought and conquered. Whatever Wesley might do or leave undone, however many and serious might be his mistakes—and he made some very serious ones, as in Georgia, and in regard to his marriage—he never afterwards allowed any circumstance to hinder him from bearing witness against the slackness, the apathy, the spiritual deadness of his time; he never ceased to call on men to repent, and believe in Jesus Christ.

The passion of the man for travel and for preaching, the thousands of miles that he rode every year, and the thousands of times that he preached; the early hour at which he rose; the long, long days of labour that he could bear without overfatigue; the dangers he escaped, the inconveniences he endured, have been told many times, and can be read best of all in his Journal. His persistence and endurance would have much to do with the respect which he often awakened even in those who were not affected by his preaching. But his main success was caused by his undoubted conviction that he had the secret of salvation, and that God was revealing Himself to men through him. This conviction started with him on his first mission, and remained with him to the end. No matter that his own views sometimes underwent change. No matter that he afterwards doubted whether during his whole Georgian mission he himself had been a converted man. No matter that he was open-minded enough to gain an occasional hint from the Quakers, to gain very much of his theology from the Moravians, and generally to be ready to note any new spiritual phenomena that might correct or enlarge his thoughts. These personal experiences never made him hesitate in his life's work, never caused him to speak with faltering tongue.

If one asks, what was the secret of salvation, according to Wesley? it can be read at large in his sermons, but is known to everyone by his collection of hymns. These hymns, many of them written by his brother Charles, expounded the way of salvation in its inward and outward aspect. They unfolded the Gospel as a historical scheme by which God had made atonement for the sins of all men by the sacrifice of His Son; but they also traced the inner life of the awakened soul, from the moment when it first hears the Divine voice calling it to repentance, through the periods of doubt and hesitation, hope and faith, till, peace attained, the struggle for the higher life of holiness begins; till, what with fighting, working, praying, suffering, interceding, the believing soul obtains perfect redemption here below, and calmly awaits removal to the heaven for which it is prepared.

The counterpart of this ideal experience will be understood from a study of Wesley's sermons. There it will be seen that the expressions used in the hymns were by no means empty metaphors. The fighting was a combat with the actual sins that Wesley saw before his eyes; he who dared challenge the consciences of the heads of the University assembled there before him as he preached from St. Mary's pulpit, was a stern and almost fearful moralist wherever he went. He never hesitated at particulars. "Every shilling which you needlessly spend on your apparel is in effect stolen from God and the poor." "Let me see before I die a Methodist congregation as plain dressed as a Quaker congregation; no Brussels lace, no elephantine hats or bonnets!"

He was, perhaps, less at home in speaking the Gospel of comfort (except to those duly convinced of sin) than in denouncing the sinful. In the first of his discourses on the Sermon on the Mount he gets a little lost among the gentle beatitudes of Jesus, and goes off to St. Paul and the Epistle to the Romans. Is it permissible to say that in character and in doctrine he was rather a follower of St. Paul than of Jesus? The most convinced of Christian believers, the pattern of missionaries, the sternest and most outspoken of preachers, with a self-confidence so naïve that it excites wonder rather than offence, he did a marvellous work in his own day, a work whose direct and indirect effects are everywhere about us. Yet can the Wesley Gospel hardly continue to be effective longer than its main thesis shall continue to be credible. And it is now fast becoming incredible. The progress both of natural science and of Biblical criticism has hopelessly undermined the doctrine of justification which Wesley preached. Thousands of preachers, with millions of money at command, cannot restore it to the position it held in Wesley's day. It was a doctrine for an age, and not for all time. Even the great organisations which owe their origin to Wesley, who are rightly proud of his name, will henceforward be useful in this world, not surely as they are faithful to his doctrine; not perhaps in proportion as they return to his stern morality, though there are lessons there still needed; but rather as they shall train men to see the needs and miseries of their time as Wesley saw those of his day, to sacrifice themselves for its sake with a kindred spirit of consecration, and to speak out their honest thought with a similar incorruptible desire for the glory of God and the good of men. We look for the Wesley that is to be.

AN APPEAL.

WE venture to make an appeal to our readers, which we hope will be taken in good part, inasmuch as it is made on behalf of a cause which is as dear to many of them as it is to us. We desire to ask their assistance in extending the circulation and thereby the usefulness of THE INQUIRER. The conduct of a newspaper such as this is a much more difficult task than is generally understood. It is not a question of working to profit. A circulation extended beyond the fondest dreams of its managers would not put money into the pockets of its proprietors. Nor, indeed, do they desire anything of the kind. The work is carried on for a cause, not for a profit, and is made possible only by the generosity of a number of friends, who subscribe, some of them very considerable sums, for its maintenance. They do this because they believe there is need for such an organ, and that its work, however faultily performed, is worth supporting.

What is that work? It may be classified under several heads. First, there is the giving the news of our churches. It is well and helpful that we should know what our friends are doing, and have the opportunity of profiting by their experience, rejoicing in their successes, and sympathising with their troubles. Next, and more important, comes the duty of upholding the special principles for which our Free Churches stand, and affording a regular opportunity for the expression of the best thought on theological and other subjects which is current amongst us. Hardly less important is the duty, too much neglected amongst us, of noting the movements of thought in other churches, and quickening our sympathies with others who approach such questions from a different point of view. Then there is a very definite missionary work open to such a paper, not by way of attack on others, but simply by putting our own views frankly and soberly before any into whose hands the paper may happen to fall. From time to time evidence comes to hand that such a work is to some extent being done. With an increased circulation it might be done much more effectively. In passing, we may observe that even among the adherents of our own churches there is room for this missionary work. For it is not all of us who take the trouble to acquaint ourselves with the latest developments of thought in our midst, or to study carefully the difficult problems we have to solve. Finally, our paper recognises its duty to stimulate and foster the religious life of our Churches. All this varied work it tries to do, and its history of over sixty years bears witness that it has not been altogether unsuccessful. Let it here be said that it claims no monopoly of this work, and gladly recognises the important services rendered by other journals.

Now if our proprietors, managers, guarantors, editor, and contributors all recognise a duty in these matters, may they not fairly say to the readers of THE INQUIRER, "You too have a share in this duty. It is a common cause, in which you can render most valuable assistance if you will, by aiding us to extend the circulation and sphere of usefulness of our paper." We have no adequate machinery for doing this. It would cost far more than we could possibly afford to push the paper in the ordinary commercial way. The bookstalls will not take it. But if each of our readers would try to get us one or two more regular subscribers, it would soon make a wonderful difference.

There is plenty of room for this work amongst ourselves. Not long since we heard of a gentleman, a life-long member of one of our congregations, who appeared never to have seen a number of THE INQUIRER. Recently, also, we were told of a well-to-do family who liked to see the paper but generally borrowed it from a neighbour. These instances, we are afraid, might be easily multiplied.

Now, it is not an expensive business to support THE INQUIRER by regularly taking it. For 6s. 6d. a year it is delivered by post, and you can begin at the June quarter, paying for the ensuing six months 3s. 3d. Will not some of our readers help us to make use of the accompanying order forms among their friends? We are pleading for the common cause, and that the example of the subscribers to our Subvention Fund should be imitated, and, if possible, their burden somewhat lightened by a general effort on the part of all our friends. It would be a great encouragement to those who have a somewhat thankless task in hand in managing the paper and its affairs, if there should be a reasonable response to this appeal.

DR. MACLAREN.

THE retirement of Dr. Maclaren from the pastorate of Union Chapel, Manchester, brings to a close the official life of one who has been called the prince of preachers and the preachers model. Dr. Maclaren proposes to retain the position of honorary pastor, and to preach now and then as his health may allow. In some way or other Manchester will no doubt do honour to one of its most distinguished citizens, who, in more ways than one, but specially as a prophet of righteousness and hope, has added lustre and renown to the city of his adoption. For more than forty years Dr. Maclaren has ministered to a great congregation, numbering among its members many of the men foremost in the social, municipal, educational and philanthropic work of the town. His was a rare instance of preaching that held both the cultured and the uncultured. While his sermons gave pleasure to intelligent, well-educated persons, university professors, students, and others, they were equally well understood by the common people, and men who had little schooling but that of life's hardship profited no less by his teaching. There is no man living whose own preaching has done so much to change the style of pulpit utterance and mould a race of preachers as Dr. Maclaren. In that respect he can only be compared with Robertson of Brighton. Both men brought a freshness of method into sermons which largely revolutionised the pulpits of their time. They condescended to no mean devices for entrapping the attention of reluctant hearers. They were sure that the preacher who panders to bad taste and ignorance, who thinks more of popularity than truth, more of reputation and notoriety than of the mysteries of God's love, is not God's servant, but the devil's. Maclaren's sermons, like Robertson's, are literature as well as oratory. The combination is rare. Many sermons that throb in the pulpit are pale, cold, and bloodless on the printed page. We turn over the sermons of a Whitfield, and we wonder where lay his power. All is as dry as the remainder biscuit. Their influence is only to be explained by the tremendous vitality and the magnetic personality of the preacher at the time. In our own day we have some famous preachers whose pulpit power is of a very noble order, but whose sermons lose nine-tenths of their charm when repeated. On the other hand, in Charles Kingsley and Dean Stanley, in Stopford Brooke and Dr. Martineau, we have preachers whose sermons affect us almost as much when read in solitude as when heard in the subdued excitement of the great congregation. Maclaren's sermons are of this order. Always clear and simple in construction, free from dogmatism, palpitating, earnest, intense in their appeal, abounding in happy and often most beautiful and poetic illustrations, expressed in the choicest English, there are no sermons it would be more profitable to put into a young preacher's hands as models of what preaching ought to be than Maclaren's.

The Baptist denomination has been fortunate during the last generation in its preachers. Spurgeon, Charles Vince, Maclaren, and Clifford make a quartette scarcely to be paralleled in any other communion. They have given the Baptist churches an enormous lift, and it would seem as if at the present moment no communion was making such strides as theirs. Mr. Meyer has lately been explaining the secrets of Baptist success. They are that Baptist theology has a hell as well as a heaven, and that Baptist churches have a rite which demands a good deal of courage for its observance. We venture to doubt the explanation. There is very little of hell, for instance, in Maclaren's sermons, and he is minister of a church which does not make adult baptism a condition of membership. Mr. Meyer himself is far from strong on hell, and at Westminster Chapel, where so much noble work is being done, adult baptism is conspicuous by its absence. The fact is, great preaching—and it is great preaching builds up great churches—has nothing whatever to do either with theological dogmas or ecclesiastical rites. Dean Stanley, and George Dawson, and Mr. Picton, and Mr. Bonner, and Mr. Baldwin Brown—heretics all, from Mr. Meyer's point of view, were yet renowned and powerful preachers, and would have moved the hearts of men whatever their theology. It is the passion for religion, not the passion for theology, which, added to the gift of eloquence, makes the great preacher. The strength and power of Maclaren was not in his theology but in his piety.

AT ANCONA AND LORETO.

NEARLY a hundred miles south-east of the marshes of Ravenna, a bold promontory projects on the coast of Italy into the sea. The ancient Dorian colonists, who made their way across the Adriatic, called it the Ankon or elbow. The name survives in the modern Ancona. Nobly situated at the southern end of a vast sweep of coast, the town rises steeply on the hills that curve round the bay to form the promontory. Below is the harbour, with a fine basin half a mile across, protected by a great pier on which stands a magnificent arch, raised by the Roman Senate in honour of Trajan, A.D. 115, to commemorate the completion of the new quay—smaller, no doubt, in those days than it is now. Tier after tier of houses clings tightly to the hill, built up with mighty terraces, linked by arches, threaded by narrow stairways, with egress sometimes beside a chimney on to a road above.

High over all stands the cathedral, planted on a platform commanding a glorious view of city and bay, coast line and Apennines. It is but a small building, yet of interesting architecture. Reared on the site of a temple of Venus known to Catullus and Juvenal, and containing some half-score of its columns, it takes the form of a Greek cross, with arms originally of equal length, though the eastern limb has been carried forward, with the sacrifice of the terminal apse. The apses remain at each transept, which contain not only side aisles, but also raised choirs and crypts beneath, giving a charming variety of elevation and line as the eye ranges across the building beneath the twelve-sided dome which crowns the centre. An exquisite porch, of later Gothic style, fronts the west; and a whole panorama of history comes into view.

Away among the Apennines Hasdrubal fell on his way to effect a junction with his brother Hannibal, and victory was secured to Rome in the long struggle of the second Punic war. The little group of coast towns, Rimini, Pesaro, Fano, Senigaglia, all bear ancient Roman names, and constituted the Pentapolis Maritima under the rule of one governor in the days of the Exarchate. Rimini saw the Catholic bishops meet in council in 350 against the Arians. At Pesaro the votive stones of the matrons of Pisaurum are among the most ancient Latin monuments extant. Fano rose on the site of a temple of fortune, Fanum Fortunæ; Senigaglia marked a settlement of Gauls, Sena Gallica; and Ancona boasted a Greek origin. Nor are the mediæval associations less suggestive. Everyone knows the story of Paola and Francesca, of the famous house of Malatesta in Rimini. Pesaro was a centre of art and literature in the days of Tasso. Browning has described for us Guercino's angel at Fano. From Ancona, St. Francis started with the Crusaders for Egypt on St. John's Day in 1219. Taken by the French in 1796, it passed in turn to the Austrians and to the Pope. Besieged by the Austrians both by land and sea in 1849, it was conquered but not subdued, as the inscription on its Palazzo del Commune proudly records, and on the jubilee of the attack, in 1899, it received the first prize for city valour under the gift of the late King Humbert. What a mingling of races, and what successions of powers, events, civilisations, this small province has witnessed!

The train carried me one Sunday morning some fifteen miles further south, till I got out with numerous fellow-travellers at Loreto. High on a ridge above the maritime plain stood the little town which contains the famous sanctuary of the Virgin's house. Some five thousand people are huddled together in the long street that creeps upon the backbone of the hill. At the eastern extremity, borne up by sub-structures of enormous mass, stands the great church built over the Casa Santa, the holy dwelling. It was a long and dusty drive from the station, round the steep slopes of the hill to the gateway of the town. The little shops of the main street were full of Catholic emblems, medals, rosaries, images of the Virgin, and the like; and the large piazza in front of the church was lined along one side with booths where an active trade was going on. Behind the great arcades on the north and west stood the Palazzo Apostolico with the bishop's residence and the Jesuits' College. Superb bronze doors adorn the entrance into the church. It is a huge building of the fifteenth century, with nave and aisles of equal height, the light being chiefly derived from small round windows above the chapels in the aisles. The dome, transepts, and choir have recently been decorated with much splendour; but the nave, touched with no soft tints of fresco or stained glass, seemed cold and bare. A large congregation was gathered, chiefly of peasants, with a small sprinkling of well-dressed visitors, and a few officers. Mass was being celebrated at the high altar in the nave, in front of the Holy House beneath the dome, and a second mass, with an independent congregation, was in progress at one of the side chapels. From the organ-loft over the great doorway came brilliant music sung by powerful though certainly not sweet voices; and the shrill tones of the instrument did not increase the devotional effect. Only when the silver bells rang at the elevation of the Host, and the hush of ineffable mystery fell on the kneeling throng—which I, at least, can never witness without a quiver—was there any manifest spirit of worship. At other points of the service, the groups which I watched from behind a pillar, broke into talk, or even laughing, without reserve.

By-and-by the last words had been said. The sacristan came to hurry me away to see the Tesoro before it was closed at noon. The church was full of moving throngs, so into the treasury I went. It was a large apartment lined with cupboards crammed with jewels, diamond tiaras, ruby necklaces, bracelets and ornaments of every description, or with costly vessels for the altar, the gifts of sovereigns and of the faithful from all parts of the world. It was a strange spectacle, and I wondered when some wild impulse would at last arise to protest against the folly of which these gems were the mute witnesses. Still more pitiful was the sight within the Holy House itself. Encompassed by richly carved marble screens, it stood beneath the great dome. Inside, it appears like a room with rough stone walls, some twenty-eight feet long, twelve and a half feet wide, and about thirteen feet high. The small space reserved for worshippers was crowded with kneeling figures as I entered. Silver lamps hung in front of the altar, and behind a superb fretwork of gilding one dimly discerned two small black objects. They were the heads of the images of the Virgin and Child, supposed to have been carved in cedar by St. Luke. Rich robes and sumptuous jewels caught the gentle glow of the lamps, and stirred the imagination of the worshipper, who saw in these figures the visible representation of the everlasting marvel of the Word made flesh, in the form recognised in every home, a Mother and a Child.

The Holy House (so runs the story) was the Virgin's home at Nazareth. When the Holy Land passed into the power of the Turks in 1291, the sacred dwelling was miraculously transported into Dalmatia, and there deposited on the hill of Raunizza, between Tersatto and Fiume. But its stay there was only temporary. Three years later, on the night of December 10, 1294, it was conveyed by angels across the Adriatic, and placed on the hill of Piceno, in a grove of bays which bowed before it in reverent salutation. Hence came the name of Laureto, or later Loreto. The house, we are told, was built of the rock of Palestine, and the mortar which cemented its stones was true Hebrew mortar. It has no foundations, they remained in Palestine, and when pious deputations both from Dalmatia and Piceno proceeded to make enquiries about the miracle, it was found that they corresponded exactly with the dimensions of the structure on the Italian hill. What further verification could the believer want? So it has been the most favoured of the Virgin's sanctuaries, though recently, it might be supposed, Lourdes has come into greater prominence. The English Catholics of an earlier generation paid their devotions here, and Faber triumphantly records a signal instance of her power in some such words as these:—"I asked of her something exceedingly difficult, and she got it for me in half an hour!"

It was with a feeling of inexpressible relief that I finally left the church, passed through the Piazza whence the throng of salesmen and buyers had departed—it was after one o'clock—and took short cuts down the hill to make my way across the fertile plain that separated Loreto from Monte Conero, the highest point upon the coast. By devious tracks around fields of corn and maize, among olives and fruit trees sycamores and vines, now on the railway line, now past some peasant's cottage, now across rivers, winding in deeply furrowed channels to the sea, I finally reached the road to Sirolo, a little town which climbed the slopes of Monte Conero from the low cliffs upon the shore. The hawthorn flowering in the hedge, the occasional chestnut blossom, the scarlet poppies and red clover in the fields, with a hundred other familiar flowers, spoke of the dear beauties nearer home. There was no one upon the way for miles, till suddenly I saw before me a crying child going towards Sirolo. As I passed, he looked up at me piteously. What did he want? His whole soul was possessed by some childish grief, but I could not understand the broken words amid his sobs; I could only try the universal language of consolation, and finally offer him some bread and cheese. He took it, and I passed on. A few minutes later I heard the little feet behind me. He could not bear to be left alone with his woe, so he curled his little hand among my fingers, and we trudged along the dusty way together. How old was he, had he a mother, what troubled him? He could not comprehend my questions. I wondered how long the situation would last. We passed some peasants playing their Sunday game at bowls by the road-side. The youths and maidens came down from Sirolo, and sang the eternal song of love and joy in the sweet spring sunshine. The little chap's sobs had long since ceased. Suddenly he darted away and stood by a tall gate at the road-side, whose fastening was far above his reach. A little homestead was at some distance within. I opened the gate and he ran in. Women called to him from an upper window, and I knew he was safe. The lost home was found again. I climbed the steep sides of Monte Conero, and at the top met other members of my party. There was a wondrous view of sea and mountain. Below lay the Adriatic, beaten by strong wind into foam around the rocks upon the coast, but far off blue with a depth and intensity to which Mr. Brett's brightest hues were pale like milk. Southward, at no great distance from the sea, the giants of the Apennines, the Monti Sibyllini and the Gran Sasso, rose suddenly from the maritime plain to the height of more than eight or nine thousand feet, their upper slopes shining white with snow, the lower seamed with deep ravines down which the torrents plunged headlong to the main. Here there was liberty, grandeur, room to think and feel and be. Verily the earth was the Lord's and the fulness thereof. And the glory of the world blended with the cry of a little child, as over against the religion of dogma and tradition there arose the religion of nature and humanity.

LIFE SAYS.

NOON—and the day is bright;
June—and the year is crowned;
Life is a-tiptoe, stands at height,
Smiles to the world all round.
Music of birds and brooks,
Laughter on vale and hill—
Laughter and music? Farewell, books;
Life says the best thing still.

"Out of the night, the morn";
Hark, how the great word goes!
Out of the soil, the rough black thorn,
Out of the thorn, the rose.
Out of the morn, the day,
The noon-joy clear and strong;
Out of the dust the soul wins a way,
Out of the soul, the song!"

THE PERMANENT CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

SIR,—You will remember that last year you kindly gave me the opportunity to appeal, through your pages, for help for our schools for weak-minded children. Friends were most generous and sympathetic, and I received not only substantial money help, but many kind and encouraging letters. I am glad to say that a number of those who helped us last year have become annual subscribers to our fund, and this emboldened me to ask you to again find space for a short letter from me.

Our schools, so far, are most successful. The Boys' School is full, the Girls' School will be full next week. Indeed, we could easily fill four or five such buildings, if we only had them. We have constantly to refuse applications, and very sad indeed it is to do so. Our children are very good and happy; some of the boys have now been a year in school, and begin to be quite useful about the house and in the garden, which we encourage them to consider as their own. The poultry are a great delight to both boys and girls, and will, we hope, prove a source of considerable income to the schools. We have taken over ten out of the twenty acres of land given to us by the Lewis Trustees, and shall shortly have possession of the other ten. But our best news of all is that Mr. Thomasson has promised us £1,000 to begin building again with. Other smaller sums, for the same purpose, have come in, and a new school will shortly be set in hand. But we want more money—not only for that, but for the expenses incurred in getting our land into order. We cannot afford to neglect it, but draining, manuring, and planting are proving so costly that I am most anxious just now as to where the money is to come from. Then we must have pig-styes, and we want more fowl-houses. In fact, this year is, in many ways, full of expenses that will not occur again. Our children will not again cost us so much for clothing. Many of them have come to us in a deplorable condition of rags and dirt. (Our girls') mother almost grudged the beautiful clothing of certain dolls that came to us at Christmas. I may say that Christmas was made delightful for the children almost entirely by some good-natured young people. Two girls found toys and sweets for every child. Another gave us the tree, others dressed very special dolls, and so, in one way and another, the boys and girls had a better time than they ever had before in their sad little lives.

Now we feel that our movement has taken hold, it is no longer necessary, as a rule, to convince people that our plan is a wise one, and we are limited in our work only by lack of funds. I know, very well, how constant are the demands upon the purses of generous givers, but still, may I ask for help again? We need, not only money for the building fund, but a sum of about £300 to pay for extra expenses. If someone would give us our pig-styes, or a pig-stye, and someone else our fruit trees (they are planted and must be paid for), or if friends would send us numbers of small sums to be used for these and similar purposes, we should be relieved from considerable anxiety, and should sooner be able to make our land profitable. As it is, we have sold a quantity of potatoes and eggs. Every month adds to our list of subscribers, and I hope, in a year or two, to see our future assured. Meantime, we do need help badly. I am leaving home for a holiday early in July. If, between now and then, anyone who reads this would like to go to the schools, I shall be delighted to arrange a visit. I go myself every Tuesday.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Children's Convalescent Nursing Home, Winifred House, was held on June 10, at University Hall, Gordon-square, when Mr. C. S. Loch, of the Charity Organisation Society, took the chair.

Mr. W. M. BLYTH, hon. treasurer, read the financial statement, which showed some slight falling off in the amount received for subscriptions, though the receipt of two legacies, £200 from the late Miss Rowland, a generous friend of the Home since its commencement, and £50 from the executors of the late Mrs. J. Campbell, had made the total receipts larger than usual.

Miss M. PRITCHARD, hon. secretary (after giving a cordial message of greeting from Mr. Robert Hampson, whose ill-health alone prevented his attendance), read the annual report. This showed that forty-four children had been received during the past year, the average number of beds in constant use having been 16½. Of the forty-four children, sixteen suffered from hip or spinal disease; and of these, ten had remained throughout the year. Six children had become "walking ones" during that time, and almost every one had made marked improvement. Four children had been treated for rickets, and twenty-four were in a debilitated condition and needed carefully "building up." All these cases did splendidly.

During the year there had been three cases of scarlet fever, brought in by a brother and sister, who developed it a few days after admission. Happily, owing to prompt isolation and removal to hospital, the disease did not spread except to the one nearest companion.

The report concluded with expressions of thanks to the many friends who had sent gifts of clothing, food, plants, and toys, and with an earnest appeal for a piano, to replace the one in the children's playroom, which is now quite past giving forth sweet melodious strains.

Mr. C. S. Loch's Address.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, gave a most interesting and inspiring address, in the course of which he said:—

There are two or three questions which I want to submit to you in connection with this report. I was struck by the distinction made between "carrying" cases, "lying" cases, and "walking" cases; and I thought at once of some adults, who certainly lie on their backs when we want them to walk, and many in the community who always want to be carried. Now one of the most pathetic reasons for the work at Winifred House is that of teaching children to walk in order that they will not want to be carried later on. That this is so is evidenced in the report, where we are told of young people, who return to visit the Home in after years to express their gratitude, and to explain how they are now able, in one way or another, to earn their own livelihood. I do not think there could be any better tribute to your work than this fact suggests.

And yet is it not strange that there are so many people who do not take much interest in this steady, quiet kind of work? It seems as though the public in general looked upon it much as a dog looks upon his master while he is gardening. A dog cares nothing at all about gardening, but, as he is your good friend, he stands by and watches you while you laboriously dig the ground and plod on at your task. But if a rabbit crosses the path the dog is up and after it in an instant. Just so with many people; they stand by you in a way, but are not really interested in your work, though if anything comes along that can be done quickly, hunted down in a moment, then they are ready. It is this outside public, with this dog-like sense, that we have to haul, and draw, and pull in the direction of reasonable charity; and I cannot but think that a visit of such people to this Home, where the work is so thorough, would have a very good effect.

I should like to detach slices from some of our great hospitals, and take the bricks, and with them make small separate homes. Then, having got these reasonable units of seventeen to twenty people, we might get the home feeling to arise afresh, and the two things going together which should never be separated; namely, improvement in the moral as well as in the physical health of those who are in distress.

When one thinks of our hospitals, and particularly of the out-patient department, one feels again and again that it is a dreadful thing that these crowds should surge up day by day, with ricketty children, and with cases of phthisis, really as a matter of course. It seems as if we take it as a matter of course, that in our midst, in our own household, there must be unclean things. Yet very many of these diseases—so doctors say—are quite preventible. Now, my hope and theory is that if these things are preventible, we shall arrive some day at the conclusion that they shall be prevented: that what is preventible must be prevented. And if we get to that feeling, no person will go into a hospital without there being a reflective movement on the home.

Looking at the funds of this Home, and at those of some of the larger institutions in London—under Poor Law or other management—one is astonished at the contrast. It is clear you must have a most economical housewife somewhere in your administration. Good charity does not need huge expense. Yet again and again in London we have enormous expenditure, going together with very small results. Why? Because the hearts of those interested in the matter do not go forward, as it were, with every penny of the expenditure. It is when you think of the result of pence (and pounds as well, of course) being properly expended that you get good charitable work.

Another thing that struck me in this report was the summary at the end—the medical report, which shows how the children stayed on, and on, and on. I would contrast this with another form of charity which very much struck me and amused me. You have in one case "350 weeks'" treatment—a sort of Methuselah life of weeks—"no permanent improvement to be expected; will probably have to leave soon." I like that for this reason:—You would wish for permanent improvement, of course, but it is good to have had a good try—to try for so many weeks to make one poor girl a competent woman, even if you fail. Then take another case "60 weeks: walks well: in good condition." There is a positive charm in thinking how some of these children trotted out from where they had been carried in! What a contrast this is to another kind of entry here in the notebook of a clergyman, which tells of a man, wife and family, in dire distress, being helped (?) by one or two meat and coal tickets and a pair of boots! Such an inadequate form of help is surely as mischievous as it is misleading.

And now I want to put before you a picture of what might be if we went back on our past history, and reconstructed the whole question of the care of the poor. Suppose charity was allowed to have its own way in trying to draw all classes, of whatever religion or sect, into one. And that, instead of having these big institutions, we had small institutions scattered about here and there—little groups of people at work everywhere. And suppose the religious feeling of the community backed the movement, and said "we should rather do voluntarily with our hearts what is right in this matter, than act under compulsion." If we had that feeling in and around small bands of earnest workers, could we not deal with what a lady here mentioned to me just now as the "black spots" of London? The problem is not a very large one. The geographical areas of these black spots would make only a small town. Why are we such helpless creatures in face of this problem? I hold that it is because we have lost our faith in charity—I use "charity" in a large sense and not the small sense. If there was a working belief, a growing belief in it, we should turn round on our history and reassert the duty of charity, and build up a system of personal work which would enable us to carry out its programme. I hope that a new thought of charity and duty will arise, and that out of it will come a new development, of a new soul, so to speak, in our men and women. George Herbert concludes his quaint poem of "The Porch," at the beginning of "The Temple," with these words:—

> If thou do ill, the joy fades, not the pains:
> If well, the pain doth fade, the joy remains.

So shall it be, I believe, with those who pass under such a porch as this into the Temple of Charity.

The resolution was seconded by the Rev. W. WOODING, and carried unanimously.

Dr. ARTHUR BALLANTYNE moved, and Miss BUSK seconded, a resolution of thanks to the Hon. Treasurer, Hon. Secretaries, the Committee and Hon. Auditor, and their re-appointment during the coming year.

A vote of thanks to the Hon. Medical Officers, the Lady Superintendent and her Staff, was moved by Dr. S. C. PRITCHARD, and seconded by Miss MARGARET MICHAEL, Lady Guardian. Both these resolutions were unanimously carried.

After a few appreciative words from Mr. M. BLYTH upon Mr. C. S. Loch's inspiring words, the proceedings terminated.

BI-CENTENARY OF RIVINGTON CHAPEL.

THE bi-centenary of Rivington Chapel was celebrated on Wednesday, June 10. A service of commemoration was held in the chapel in the afternoon, conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, a near neighbour of Rivington Chapel, among the oldest Nonconformist places of worship. Mr. Street, taking as text Psalm lxxxiv. 1,2, spoke of the traditions of freedom and piety associated with that old country chapel and of their spiritual forefathers, who had built it (as the trust said) "for the free exercise of their divine worship therein." The sermon concluded with the aspiration that the living generation might truly feel and faithfully practise the religion of freedom and truth, integrity and piety, so that those who were coming after should receive the inheritance from their hands enriched by the additional blessing of their own fidelity to principle, and—please God—fulfil more worthily than they of the present generation the trust which would descend to them!

After tea, a public meeting was held in the schoolroom, and was largely attended. The chair was taken by Mr. R. D. Darbishire, and among those present were the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, A. Gordon, C. J. Street, C. Roper, E. Allen, R. C. Moore, E. S. Hicks, and S. Thompson (minister of the chapel), Alderman James Lawrence, Messrs. Albert Nicholson, Thomas Harwood, and Andrews Crompton. Mr. Crompton read a number of letters of regret for absence.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, expressed, on behalf of the congregation, their pleasure in seeing so many friends present, and referred to his own long connection with Rivington, the memories of which went back over seventy years. His grandfather and father had lived there, and among many things he had learnt there had been the enjoyment of the country, the woods and the hills and the waterfalls. He was tutored there by the clergyman of the church and by the minister of their own chapel, and he was brought up in the recollection of the chapel services. There he had learnt the lesson, which had never passed out of his mind, of the perfect brotherhood of worshippers in neighbouring churches. He did not know whether the custom obtained to this day, but when he was a youth, and long afterwards, it was the habit of both religious societies in Rivington to act jointly on the occasion of their annual sermons. The church was closed, and all went to chapel, or the chapel was closed and all went to church for the day. That was a lesson that had moulded a great deal of his life—the absolute faithfulness of honest worship under whatever forms. These forms, whether they were liturgy or whether they were unwritten prayers, were human devices, after all, and the real life and strength that lay in every church, however difficult they might find it to appreciate these forms and creeds, was the Christian life of open, equal brotherhood under every form of belief — the Christianity of Jesus, which they could never cease to drink the full measure of—the thing that led them, everyone in his own situation, to sacrifice, and—he said it gravely—to crucifixion. No life was complete until there was realised the absolute loss of self in the presence of this duty. And with it all, the crown of it all, was the Kingdom of God within them, the open brotherhood, the Christianity of Jesus. The traditions that had surrounded that chapel during the past 200 years had been traditions of sincerity of life and faith and worship. It had kept them very humble. There were not many of them, and very few of authority. They had had a good squire and a good neighbour or two, but the rest had been steady, honest, intelligent yeomen and their women, and they had brought up their sons and daughters to go to chapel, and they had learnt in that chapel the same principles—the principles of freedom of belief, of devout religion, and a hopeful death. He had been rather preaching to them, and, seeing the gentlemen whom they had on the platform, he might have left it to them, but he could not help speaking out of the fulness of his heart of his connection with Rivington.

Of the historical address subsequently given by the Rev. Principal Gordon, it is not easy to give in a newspaper abstract a satisfactory account, and we are glad to see from a note in Saturday's Chorley Standard, to which we are indebted for this report of the celebration, that the proceedings are to be published in pamphlet form, when we trust that Mr. Gordon's address will be given in full, together with the historical sermon preached on Sunday by the Rev. S. Thompson.

Addresses were also given by the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, C. J. Street, and S. Thompson, who proposed a vote of thanks to the preacher, the chairman, and speakers. This was seconded by Mr. Andrews Crompton. At the chairman's suggestion, a message of sympathy was sent to Mr. J. W. Crompton, who was unable to be present.

WE see that we can only do a deed to God by doing that deed for Him—only by offering ours as the hands with which it shall be done. Our human love for one another, and all our human help, is not less His for being ours. "God's tender mercy" is the name in heaven for what we call on earth "a drink of water." Many dear things of providence He hands to His little ones by each other.

ASSOCIATION OF IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS AND OTHER FREE CHRISTIANS.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CONFERENCE.

ON Saturday, June 6, a conference of Sunday-school teachers and other friends interested in the religious education of young people connected with the congregations in the Association was held at Ballycarry. The meeting was held in the afternoon; the bright and cheerful meeting, house was quite filled with a deeply interested audience. The churches or schools represented were: Antrim, Ballycarry, Belfast—First Church, York-street, All Souls', Domestic Mission, Mountpottinger, Knock — Cairncastle, Comber, Dromore, Dunmurry, Holywood, Larne, Moneyrea, Rademon, Raloo, and Templepatrick. The ministers present were Revs. W. G. Marsden (pastor loci), D. Walmsley, B.A., Alex. O. Ashworth (convener of conference), W. J. Davies, W. H. Drummond, B.A., John Jellie, J. A. Kelly, R. Lyttle, John McCleary, R. J. Orr, M.A., G. J. Slipper, W. S. Smith, and Fredk. Thomas.

Mr. Thomas Andrews, D.L. (President of the Association), who was announced to take the chair, was, unfortunately, prevented by important public duties from being present, and Mr. Samuel Magill, of Larne, was moved to the chair.

The hymn, "All people that on earth do dwell," having been sung, the convener announced letters of apology from Revs. Alfred Davison, James Kennedy, S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., Alfred Turner, and Wm. Weatherall.

The chairman called upon Rev. D. Walmsley, who read a paper on "Catechisms: their abuse and disuse in Sunday-school teaching."

The purpose of the paper was to discourage dependence on catechisms in religious teaching, and justify the teacher's appeal to his own personal conviction of truth and right. There was a certain convenience, Mr. Walmsley said, in having the material of religious instruction cut and dried and chopped up fine, ready for popping into the open mouths of the children, but one word of a man's own experience was worth volumes of talk about other people's beliefs, and the most helpful and valuable thing in the teacher's intercourse with his class was the self-communication of the maturer and better-furnished mind to the receptive spirits of the young. No one more than the Unitarian needed to be on guard against the tendency to shirk the declaration of his own conviction and quote somebody else as bail for his opinions. Our people were not less sincere than others in their pieties. Conviction did not mean less with us than with our neighbours. But there were too many who felt a sort of false shame that made them outwardly disloyal to convictions they did intimately feel; they seldom spoke of the deeper things of the spirit even with closest friends; they were chary of unbosoming themselves. But there were times when it was a duty to speak out, not merely upon theological questions as to which they were at discord with a friend, but of the positive and helpful religious convictions which came home to them and made their faith and hope in God. Mr. Walmsley's advice to teachers was:—Speak of what you yourselves feel sure of; do not quote as true what you really doubt, with the preface, "we are taught to believe"; if you are not convinced of any matter, acknowledge it frankly; do not teach your doubts; but think, realise, prepare to speak, and you will help the young folk better than if you coached them in catechisms till they were word-perfect.

In the discussion which followed, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND said it was hardly fair to treat catechisms in the way they had been spoken of by Mr. Walmsley. Given the general outline of the catechism, suppose it puts in form your own ideas in a way with which you agree, you can make it exceedingly living and real. It was a pity if the catechism could not be used when it expressed the general teaching of the Church. We had over-emphasised lonely individualism in imparting religious truth.

Rev. ALEX. O. ASHWORTH said he could never understand the difficulty of our making a statement of our religious convictions, or why we should skrink from expressing ourselves on matters of religious belief. We were none the less at liberty to change our opinions when we saw reason. The result of our being too chary in speaking of our Unitarian opinions to young people growing up in our schools and churches was that a large percentage of those young people did not understand why we stood out from the crowd, and did not realise in any intelligent way what we as Unitarians stand for.

Rev. J. A. KELLY said the practical effect of the paper would be to discourage the teacher to do his work. If you do away with catechisms, you increase the difficulty of teaching tenfold. A man in earnest must have a belief and must teach it. If we do not prejudice the minds of our young people in favour of the doctrines and principles we hold dear, their minds will be prejudiced in favour of other views and principles less desirable. A good farmer does not leave his fields to their own resources, but distinctly prejudices them in favour of growing some special crop, and we should go on sowing the good seed in religious matters which we believe in.

Rev. JOHN MCCLEARY said we need not go back to the dead past. Jesus catechised when he asked of his disciples "Whom do men say that I am?" and "Whom say ye that I am?" Earnest Sunday-school teachers can do without any of these helps.

Miss ANDREWS said a Sunday-school teacher should be an idealist. Unitarians were free to develop. Most teachers repudiate the idea of dependence on these outside helps. In the use of catechisms, starting with the best intention not to impose creeds, we end with imposing them, nevertheless.

Mr. KELLIGHER said the vital thing is to set children to learn something. There are too many things which tend to obscure the minds of the young. Education was not complete without being deeply blended with religious instruction.

Rev. R. LYTTLE, in moving a vote of thanks to the Ballycarry minister, congregation, and teachers for their hospitality, and to Mr. Walmsley for his paper, said we had not rated the average teacher sufficiently high. Teachers had been able to do good work without catechising. If we use catechisms they should not be learned by rote. If used, it should be at home, and we should talk directly to scholars. We need to teach scholars a reverence for the spiritual and moral things of life, and the aim should be to impart and develop religious life.

Mr. WALMSLEY made a brief reply to the criticisms. Invitations for the 1904 meeting having been received from Templepatrick and Dromore, it was resolved, on the motion of Rev. D. Walmsley, seconded by Rev. J. A. Kelly, that the new Sunday-school committee be recommended to favourably consider the visit to Dromore in 1904.

A hearty vote of thanks, enthusiastically carried, was tendered the chairman, and the large company adjourned to the schoolroom, where a substantial tea had been provided, and was served by many willing hands to the visitors.

The day was one of glorious sunshine, and there were present at one time or other during the afternoon over 300 people.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting of the Yorkshire Union was held at the Domestic-street Chapel, Holbeck, Leeds, on Wednesday, June 10. In the afternoon, the religious service was conducted by the Rev. C. Harvey Cook, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, of Monton. The collection amounted to £4 6s. 8½d.

In the evening, the public meeting in the schoolroom was well attended, the Lord Mayor of Leeds, Mr. John Ward, J.P., presiding.

A resolution protesting against the Education Act, moved by the Rev. C. Hargrove and seconded by the Rev. J. M. Whiteman, was unanimously passed, and a further resolution, moved by Councillor G. Ratcliffe, of Holbeck, thankfully acknowledged the efforts of the councils of Leeds, Sheffield, Hull, and other towns in clearing insanitary areas, and providing for better housing of the people.

Only a meagre report of these meetings has reached us, almost too late for use this week, but we understand that during the day a welcome was offered to ministers newly settled in the district—the Revs. A. H. Dolphin, P. E. Richards, and F. H. Vaughan—that an address was given by the Rev. J. E. Manning on the relation of our churches to the poor, and an address on the work of the B. and F. U. A. by their delegate, the Rev. F. W. Stanley. We presume that an annual report and accounts were also presented and passed.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

APPEAL.

Chichester. — Sunday-school anniversary services were held last Sunday, appropriate addresses being given by the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott, in the morning to the children, in the evening to parents and friends. The special collections for the Summer Treat Fund were a little in excess of last year.

Aberdeen.—Last Sunday, following its usual practice, the Unitarian congregation transferred its second service to the Broad Hill, for the summer, The day was fair, but cold; and it was feared the meeting would be small. However, an audience of over 600 assembled, and, mostly seated on the grass on the hollow hill, listened to Mr. Webster's address on "How should God be Sought?" At the close of the address questions were asked by friendly critics, and answered frankly. A number of tracts were distributed. These meetings, which are now established and imitated, will be continued throughout the summer, weather permitting.

Blackpool (North Shore).—On Sunday last flower services were conducted by the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth. There were large congregations, special music, and the offertory exceeded previous years. At the Sunday-school in the afternoon Mr. Scott delighted and instructed the children and adults on the subject, "If I were a King." Mr. John Chadwick visited the Sunday-school on the 7th, and sent a report, which was read by the superintendent, Mr. T. Underwood.

Choppington.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held on June 7, when the children sang special hymns and recited poetry and portions of Scripture. The services were conducted by Mrs. Tweedy, of Newcastle, who addresseds the children in the afternoon and the parente and teachers in the evening. The services wer, well attended, the evening service especially the church being closely filled.

Clydoch Vale, South Wales.—On Sunday, June 14, the congregation held its annual services. The preachers were the Rev. John Davies, Allt-y-placa, and the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare. The wretchedly cold and wet weather prevented many of the more scattered folks in the Rhondda from attending, yet the muster of Unitarians was quite encouraging. The afternoon and evening services were held at the Saron Congregational Chapel. The brethren at Saron are without a minister just now, and that enabled them to invite to worship with them in the evening. To see Unitarian and Congregationalist worshipping together was a welcome sign of the breaking down of old barriers.

Halifax.—The prizes for early and regular attendance at the Northgate-end Sunday-school were presented on Whit-Sunday by Mr. Arnold H. Wadsworth, one of the superintendents. A number of recitations were said by the scholars. The scholars and those from the Queen's-road branch were taken in waggons to Lightcliffe on Whit-Tuesday, where they had buns and coffee in a field as usual.

Ipswich.—Flower services were held in the Friars-street Chapel on Sunday, June 7. Both services were well attended, the evening being a record attendance during the Rev. Lucking Taverner's ministry. Special music was rendered by the choir, and one hymn, composed by Mr. Frank Woolnough, choir-master, was much appreciated.

London Sunday School Society.—The annual united service for teachers and elder scholars of the London Sunday-schools was held at Essex Hall last Sunday afternoon, but in consequence of the unfortunately wet weather the attendance was not nearly so large as on previous occasions. Only the following six schools sent contingents: Bermondsey, Essex Church, Newington Green, Peckham, Stamford-street, and Stratford; but one or two representatives from other schools were also present. About 150 in all took part in the service, among whom were Mr. John Harrison, the President, the Rev. Philemon Moore, Miss Marian Pritchard, and Messrs. Ion Pritchard, A. H. Biggs, Ronald Bartram and W. H. Ballantyne. Mr. E. A. Reeves kindly presided at the organ. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, whose address on "Promises" was followed with close attention. It dealt with the importance of keeping promises in our dealings with others, and especially those made to ourselves in the endeavour to attain the highest ideal of life.

Mottram.—The first of a series of Saturday Afternoon Rambles, for the purpose of making better acquaintance with the beautiful scenery of the district, was held on Saturday, May 30. A large party walked from Mottram to Compstall and Marple through the valley of the river Etherow, which divides Cheshire from Derbyshire. On Saturday, June 6, Coombe Rocks were visited, a mountain ridge about three miles from Mottram, from the top of which there were splendid views of the Peak district, including Kinder Scout, Kinder Downfall, and part of the village of Hayfield, the district so vividly described by Mrs. Humphry Ward in "David Grieve." On the same day the choir had their annual treat to Chester.

Stannington.—On Whit Monday the children of the Sunday-school enjoyed their usual festivities, marching through the village and singing hymns, and after tea, in which they were joined by a large number of teachers and friends, playing in a field kindly lent by Mr. G. H. Revitt. The anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 14, when very appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. C. Harvey Cook, of Leeds. The collections, owing to inclement weather, were slightly below the average. Special hymns and a chorus were sung by the choir and children of the Sunday-school.

Sunderland.—The chapel anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 14, conducted by Miss Lucas, of Darlington. On Monday the annual tea meeting was held, when Miss Lucas and the Rev. W. H. Lambell, H. Cross, and T. Paxton were the speakers. There was again a good attendance, including friends from Gateshead and South Shields, and the meeting was very successful.

Swansea.—The service in the Unitarian Church last Sunday evening was conducted by Mr. B. J. Elsmere, a recognised minister in the Society of Friends. At the beginning of his address Mr. Elsmere expressed his thanks for the liberality which had opened that pulpit to him, and he added: "I believe I am in the second oldest building in the town of Swansea. I think the date outside is 1690, while that of the Society of Friends' Meeting House is 1656. That's the first, and this is the second. Our forefathers suffered for religious liberty, and it seems that we shall soon be called on to suffer again. I trust that the grace which made them the men and women they were will enable us to be noble sons of noble sires. Some people seem amazed that I should be here. Why not? It's all in the commission. I haven't read in the Bible: 'Go and preach the Gospel to the Society of Friends'—I have read, 'Go and preach the Gospel to every creature.' I had the honour some twenty-four years ago to preach in St. Mary's Church. The then vicar—Dr. Morgan—couldn't ask me into the pulpit as you have done, it was more than his gown was worth; but he placed a hassock on the chancel steps, and said, "You can preach from there, brother, everyone will be able to hear you." I have preached in Baptist, Congregational, and all kinds of Methodist churches. This is the first time to preach in a Unitarian church. I feel just as free here as anywhere else, and I hope to-night you will forget the messenger, for I want you to remember the message." The text was "Come up higher," and in the course of his address, which appears from the report in the South Wales Daily Post to have been very unconventional in form, Mr. Elsmere said: "There's no one here so good he may not become a little better," and solemnly added, "If this is all I have to tell you, it's only half a Gospel; He who tells us to climb, Himself has come down to help us."—"In these days, men smile when they read about Luther throwing the ink pot at the Devil, and at the visions of Fox and Wesley; but, if we were only as inward and spiritual as these men were, we should have visions too."—"You can burn my Bible, and I have no creed; but you can't take away from me my sense of the Divine presence."

Whitchurch, Salop.—On Sunday, June 14, the Sunday-school anniversary services were held at the Church of the Saviour, the Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., being the preacher. The wet weather thinned the attendance, but the collections were in excess of last year.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE meetings of the National Conference and of Whitsuntide being now in the past, we can turn our faces uninterruptedly to the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers to be held at Amsterdam during the first week of September. As with the great meetings in London two years ago, we hope to be able to publish a full record of the proceedings, and in preparation for the event propose during the coming weeks to publish a number of special articles dealing with some of the chief interests of the country and of the people we are to visit in their relations to liberal religious thought and life.

WE understand that at the meeting of the National Conference Committee, held in London this week, it was decided to appoint sub-committees to investigate the schemes referred to in the Presidential Address, and in the paper by the Rev. Joseph Wood, at the Liverpool meeting. Their preliminary plans and suggestions as to methods of inquiry are to be presented to the next meeting of the Committee, which will be held at Manchester, November 10—the day when the autumnal meetings of the B. & F. U. A. will be opened in that city. It was decided also to appeal for funds to carry on the work of the Conference, and in particular to enable a paid secretary to be engaged till the "interim Conference," which is to be called to receive the report of the Committee on the points involved.

THE Wesleyans kept the Bi-centenary of Wesley's birth joyfully at Epworth, but the most remarkable utterance of that day was not at Epworth but at Wesley's Chapel, where the Rev. W. L. Watkinson preached a sermon from Gal. iii. 2, 3, "Having begun in the spirit are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" The Bi-centenary reminds us, he said, that we have a past. "Now a past often proves a dangerous thing. Men attempt to live upon the past, they are impeded by it, they are destroyed by it. . . . We can babble of a not inglorious past. But this will do us little good, and it may do us a great deal of harm." Wise words that will bear repeating outside of Methodism.

HERE, too, is a paragraph which has more than denominational significance:—

One of the papers recently told how an electric plant ran all night with only a corpse in charge. It appears that the night electrician at the water-power plant of a Light and Power Company was killed while oiling the engine. The machinery continued to run, with only the dead electrician in charge, until the day men came to work the next morning. The body had evidently been dead since before midnight. Modern machinery has attained to such a human-like state of perfection that it will run all night by itself without the slightest mishap, attended only by a corpse. It is dreadful to think that something like this might happen to Methodism. Its machinery has been perfected through more than a century, it has attained marvellous precision, it seems to act automatically, and it may continue to act when the life has gone out of us, when the preacher is a corpse in the pulpit, the stewards dead men in the vestry, and the members mummies in the pews. But, whenever that day comes, the work of Methodism is done.

THE Primitive Methodists held their conference this year at Newcastle. The Rev. T. H. Hunt, of Liverpool, was elected president, and the Rev. J. D. Thompson, of Aintree, secretary. Mr. W. P. Hartley, J.P., of Aintree, offered to erect at his own cost and to furnish a new building adjoining the existing college in Manchester, to be completed within two years. The new building will provide accommodation for forty additional students; and, in order that all students may have the benefit of a third year's course, Mr. Hartley undertook to pay all the expenses of the third year men for the next seven years, to the year 1910. This great scheme being joyfully accepted, it was pointed out later that a new chapel would be more than ever needed for the students (who now have to worship in the Lecture Hall). Mr. Hartley then promised also to build a college chapel. In the Book Room report it appeared that the sale of denominational literature was seriously declining.

THE Methodist New Connection Conference meets at Dudley. The Rev. W. Gillis welcomed the Conference to Dudley on behalf of the whole of the Christian churches of Dudley and the district. Among those entertaining the members of the conference, he said, were members of the Established Church, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Unitarians, and Plymouth Brethren. A resolution agreeing to send two representatives to other Methodist conferences, "who might sit in those conferences in all sessions in which ministers and laymen are jointly members, except when the conference is sitting with closed doors," was very cordially passed, and representatives were appointed for the Wesleyan, the Methodist Free Church, the Primitive Methodist, and other conferences. The Rev. W. Hookins, of Hunslet, Leeds, was elected president. The sermon of the retiring president, the Rev. M. J. Birks, contains a number of sentences worth quoting. We select only two or three:—

"Yours is not a simple gospel if it rests for support on the conclusions of the higher criticism, nor yet if it is afraid of its most rigorous research. It is not a simple Gospel if it depends on evolution or on its denial; it is not vitally concerned with reading of Assyrian tablets, Gothic architecture, or clerical gowns; it does not heed nor prohibit, but it does not like, candles and incense.

A simple Gospel is not committed to any particular theory of inspiration or theory of Atonement. It is not committed to or against any. However these may be settled, Jesus is mine, His blood avails for me and all men. If I am in error I shall still be saved in spite of it. If I have the truth, still it is Jesus that saves. Whatever "propitiation" means, it means what is necessary to lift the blackness from my soul that God's kiss of pardon may be to me the splendour of Heaven.

IN his article on "Emerson's Theism" in the INQUIRER, of May 23 Professor Upton touched upon Emerson's attitude towards the doctrine of personality in God, and quoted a reply of his to Harvard students, a short time before the delivery of his Divinity School Address in 1838, in which he said: "I deny personality to God because it is too little, not because it is too much." But this, Mr. Upton points out, did not prevent Emerson from speaking of God as the "Divine Mind," and nine years later, writing to one of his Quaker friends, Mary Rotch, of New Bedford, in answer to some questions as to doctrine, he made this statement:—

No, I never say any of these speculative things, and when I hear them I can never tell on which side I belong. I never willingly say anything concerning "God" in cold blood, though I think we all have very just insights when we are "in the mind," as our fathers used to say. In conversation sometimes, or to humility and temperance, the cloud will break away to show at least the direction of the rays of Absolute Being, and we see the truth that lies in every affirmation men have made concerning it, and, at the same time, the cramping partiality of their speech. For the science of God our language is unexpressive and merely prattle; we need simpler and universal signs, as algebra compared with arithmetic. Thus I could affirm easily both those propositions which our Mr. Griswold balances against one another; that, I mean, of Pantheism and the other ism. Personality, too, and impersonality, might each be affirmed of the Absolute Being; and what may not be affirmed of it, in our own mind? And when we have heaped a mountain of speeches, we have still to begin again, having no wise expressed the simple, unalterable fact.

Of that simple, unalterable fact, Emerson spoke in his essay on "The Over-Soul." "He that finds God a sweet, enveloping thought to him never counts his company. When I sit in that presence, who shall dare to come in? When I rest in perfect humility, when I burn with pure love, what can Calvin or Swedenborg say? . . . The soul gives itself, alone, original, and pure, to the Lonely, Original, and Pure, who, on that condition, gladly inhabits, leads, and speaks through it. . . . Behold, it saith, I am born into the great, the universal mind. I, the imperfect, adore my own Perfect. I am somehow receptive of the great soul, and thereby I do overlook the sun and the stars, and feel them to be the fair accidents and effects which change and pass. More and more the surges of everlasting nature enter into me, and I become public and human in my regards and actions. So come I to live in thoughts, and act with energies, which are immortal."

Lovers of Emerson will be glad to secure a copy of the June Bookman (6d., net), which contains fifteen different portraits of him, together with portraits of other members of his family and friends, and pictures of his house, his grave, &c. Mr. Walter Lewin contributes a valuable centenary article on Dr. Edward Emerson; he also writes concerning his father, with some delightful touches of personal reminiscence.

WE must apologise to Dr. and Mrs. Crooker and to the Richmond congregation for the belated note, which by a sinister fate found its way into last week's issue, having been crowded out a fortnight before. As in the intervening week we had reported that preaching, we trust that no one suffered serious inconvenience, and that whoever read the note merely wondered what had befallen our wits!

HAPPINESS is not what we are to look for. Our place is to be true to the best we know, to seek that, and do that; and if by "virtue is its own reward" be meant that the good man cares only to continue good, desiring nothing more, then it is a true and noble saying.—Froude.

SPECIAL SERVICES AND LECTURES.

SIR,—Several inquiries have already reached the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association respecting lectures, special services, and visits by ministers to isolated congregations. May I say that the next meeting of the Executive Committee has been postponed until July 22, so as to allow sufficient time for applications from congregations and societies before the holiday season sets in. It is desirable that all correspondence relating to this work should reach me in time to be considered by the Mission Sub-Committee which meets on July 15. There will be no further meeting until October 7.

"HOLY COMMUNION."

SIR,—A striking pamphlet under this title has just been published by the "Open Brotherhood for the Christianity of Jesus and the Kingdom of God within us." It is written at white heat by one whose soul is evidently aglow with passionate love for Jesus, though he is repelled by the ecclesiasticism and formalism and materialism which, even to a certain extent in our Free Churches, hide the real Jesus from us. I am glad to find that I am not alone in urging the wider dissemination of this appeal from an unnamed Christian to the followers of Jesus. The pamphlet is now being reprinted by Messrs. H. Rawson & Co., 16, New Brown-street, Manchester (price 2d., post free, 3d.), and is made accessible to any who may ask for it, in the hope that it may reach the heart of a truth-seeker here or there, who is tired of the shows of religion, and longs for a deeper and fuller manifestation of the life of religion itself.

The writer attempts in this pamphlet to describe a real communion service, where there is no bread to break and no wine to sip, but where, unhindered by material symbols, too associated with idolatry, spirit may commune with spirit in loving remembrance of the unique teacher whose life has blessed us all. In simple earnestness the leader makes his little congregation realise the essential spirit of that beauteous and loving life, until all share in its benediction and realise its hallowing peace. The simple service is ended by the devout and unprepared utterance of the Lord's Prayer by a young member of the assembly. And all that little fellowship is raised into communion with the ideal human life, and through it into participation in the life divine. Appended are a few remarks intended to strengthen the impressions.

Were the "Communion Service," so-called within our own Free Churches, a real service of communion, and not (as it too often is) one of Division; were it freed from a symbolism which some earnest and devout thinkers cannot distinguish from an idolatry harmful to the spirit and inimical to truth; were it made into a natural out-pouring of the soul in the attempt to reach the Over-Soul without artificial means—the objections which some of us have felt and conscientiously obeyed, against participating in a service of unreality, would vanish. But, as things usually are among us, the lonely soul must follow its own way of truth, preferring rather to be misunderstood by its fellows than disloyal to its God.

RELIGIOUS TESTS FOR MANAGERS OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

SIR,—The letter you publish shows that Mr. Colfox is annoyed because I did not reply to his speech. I sincerely apologise to him. Time was short, I had no right to speak again, and I could not perceive the relevancy of his remarks. I was quite unaware, until I saw your report, that I had used phrases which would suggest that the Education Act of 1902 compelled the municipal councils to apply religious tests to the school managers they appoint.

I was not talking about the Education Act, still less was I thinking of the Bridport Town Council. I was contending against the whole practice of attaching a sectarian test to a public office, and I quoted the common trust deed of many Anglican schools and colleges to show that certain tests are so stringent that they exclude not only all Nonconformists, but the majority of professing Churchmen.

Mr. Colfox appears to be gratified by the fact that the Act of 1902 allows one-third of the managers of a public elementary school to be appointed without a test. May I point out that, although the Bridport Town Council are not under a statutory obligation to impose a sacramental test on Mr. Colfox, they are under no obligation to abstain from doing so. In fact a large number of Parish Councils and County Councils in making similar appointments have invited the managers or trustees of a sectarian school to nominate the person to be appointed, and these promptly apply the test to which they are themselves subjected. It is true that the new Act gives a slight relief so far as one-third of the managers are concerned, but may I point out that the Act re-imposes, by Parliamentary enactment, these antiquated tests upon the other two-thirds. Last year they existed only in ancient trust deeds, often neglected and generally discredited. To-day they have been disinterred and, without revision, made part of an Act of Parliament, and a great State Department is instructed to make them effective. What a contrast this is to the curt provision of the endowed Schools Act of 1869. "Every scheme . . . . shall provide that the religious opinions of any person . . . . shall not in any way affect his qualification for being one of the governing body." If Parliament could not only remove but positively prohibit, thirty-four years ago, all sectarian tests for the managers of our great secondary schools, they could do the same for the elementary schools to-day. I for one am not lost in admiration of a "reform" which consists in giving the County Council and the Parish Council each power to remit or retain the test as regards two-sixths of the managers and, at the same time, reimposes it by statute on the remaining four-sixths.—

Yours faithfully,

A. J. MUNDELLA.

LITERATURE.

THE BIBLE IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.*

THE lectures out of which have grown this substantial volume, which it is a great satisfaction to be able to place on the library shelf side by side with Mr. Carpenter's masterly work on "The Composition of the Hexateuch," were given, as is stated in a prefatory note, in various towns in England, Scotland, and Wales, during the years 1900—1903. The note does not say, what, however, is widely known, how deep an impression the lectures made, with what keen interest they were followed in London in the autumn of 1900, in the following year in the Scotch University cities, and subsequently in great provincial towns of England and Wales. Those who remember the wealth of information they contained, their illuminating wisdom, the inspiration in their interpretation of the true religious significance of the Bible, will be among the most eager to welcome this finished book, and to commend it to others who are seeking just the help it gives. The eight lectures are there, substantially in the form in which they were delivered, but in writing them out Mr. Carpenter has been able more fully to elaborate many important points, and he has still further added to the interest of his book by a number of valuable notes. The table of contents gives a full synopsis of the lectures, but we confess that we should have been glad also of an index.

The book places a great wealth of scholarship at the service of the ordinary thoughtful reader. It is not popular in the shallow sense, yet we have not found that it contains a single dull page. It is essentially a book for people of educated intelligence and serious interests, who desire to be able to read the Bible with understanding, in the light of modern knowledge, and with a just estimate of its supreme value among the religious literatures of the world. For a guide in this respect Mr. Carpenter is eminently fitted, and his theme is repeatedly illustrated out of the rich stores of his knowledge of Indian and other Eastern religions, as well as from other unexpected sources.

The plan of the lectures is to show, first of all, what has been done up to the present time for the reasonable study of the Bible, and in vindication of freedom of inquiry, with an account of the Revised Version and the efforts of scholars which led up to it, and at the conclusion of the course to display some of the chief results of modern scholarship, with their bearing upon present-day religious life; while the five central lectures take up successively for elaborate treatment the subjects of the Law and the Prophets of the Old Testament, "The Gospels and the Early History of Christianity," and a separate discussion of "The First Three Gospels," and "The Fourth Gospel."

The historical sketch of the opening lecture on "The Struggle for Freedom of Inquiry" is by no means confined to the nineteenth century, but goes back to the works of Lardner and Locke and others early in the eighteenth century, while it is interesting to find such extremely modern phrases as that of "the historical method" used by Priestley in 1782, and that of "the higher criticism" used by Eichhorn in 1782. There is a most interesting account of what was achieved by the Broad Churchmen, the writers of "Essays and Reviews," and Colenso, and of the decisions in the Courts which opened the way for progressive scholarship in the Church; and the result Mr. Carpenter sums up in the following concluding passage:—

> The rapid advances of critical, historical, scientific, and philosophical inquiry have carried theological studies into regions which the English mind thirty years ago had hardly begun to explore. Great changes have silently taken place. Churches which were once seriously opposed have drawn together, and doctrines over which former generations hotly disputed have been quietly dismissed. The principles of the untrammelled investigation of the Scriptures have been amply vindicated by a series of distinguished scholars, who have raised the standard of theological education in all branches of the Christian Church, and have thrown off the deadening influences of ecclesiastical tradition. But it is not only the professors of divinity for whom liberty is an essential condition. Behind the ideal of free teaching in theology lies another more important still—that of a Free Church, where pastor and people shall be alike pledged only to a common pursuit of truth, and a common recognition of veracity as the first requisite of worship. To such a goal the path is long and difficult. A thousand obstacles of association and affection, of anxiety and apprehension, threaten it. Which of the great historic Churches in this country will make the first step? Of one thing they may be assured by those who have trodden it through toil and obscurity for more than two hundred years. Though they should suffer loss, obloquy, and exclusion, they will never wish to turn back.

We must not attempt here any consecutive account of the lectures, but this opening survey, with the lecture on the Revised Version which follows, telling of the labours of scholars in successive generations to secure as perfect a text as possible from the ancient Hebrew and Greek manuscripts, and on that basis to perfect the translation into English, (with some striking instances of the need for this fresh revision and its significance for Bible study), prepares the way for the deepening interest of the central questions of interpretation, both of the Old and New Testaments, with which the greater part of the course is occupied.

The lecture on "Changed Views of the Law" gives not only an account of the assured results of the critical study of the Hexateuch, acknowledged now by scholars at every point of the theological compass, but describes also the course of the investigation, from the earliest questionings as to the composite character of the "Books of Moses," showing the irresistible progress of conviction, with a final word as to the place of the Law in the religion of Israel. "The Law," Mr. Carpenter says, "was the vehicle through which the truths of the higher Prophecy were preserved and adapted to the national life. . . . . It accomplished what Prophecy had been unable practically to achieve. In the piety of the Psalms we see the blossom of its idea of personal holiness." And then, finally, "the Law gave way again to Prophetism in the still nobler form of the Gospel. Its essential aim after the divine ideal, 'Be ye holy, for I, Yahweh, your God, am holy,' was set free for ever from the limitations of ancient ritual, and transfigured into the final goal of all religion, 'Be ye perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect.'" This lecture, we trust, will send many readers to Mr. Carpenter's greater work on the Hexateuch, and also to Mr. Montefiore's Hibbert lectures on the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews, to which reference is made in the notes.

"The Law" and "The Prophets" are not to be separated in any true estimate of the religion of Israel, and Mr. Carpenter's lecture on the latter with its clear historical interpretation blends a large measure of the inspiration of those great teachers. The truth of "Ethical Monotheism," was, as Kuenen said, the contribution made by the prophets of the eighth century, B.C. to the religion of the world, and Mr. Carpenter shows how, in the course of the history, that great conception grew clearer and was filled with greater spiritual power. The rise of the prophets, he says, cannot be explained. "The swift succession, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, reminds us of other periods of marked intellectual and artistic activity, when quickening influences have played through the human spirit; the rise of Greek tragedy, of Early Italian painting, of Elizabethan drama, has in each case a mystery at its core." Let the reader turn to this passage, and see what follows on p. 187, and he will take up the study of the whole lecture, and the great literature with which it deals, with an added zest. The Ethical Monotheism of the prophets, Mr. Carpenter shows, leads to larger conceptions of Divine providence, and the ideal of the Kingdom of God on earth. Thus he concludes the lecture:—

> The study of the general history of religion only lifts this great conception into clearer view. Its grandeur is heightened by the political insignificance of the people which gave it birth. It is wholly misjudged when it is ascribed to the inflated egoism of a nation whose dreams of empire had miscarried.
> It is the product of a teleological interpretation of history, and its worth for religion is beyond price. The world that we know is wider than that within the prophet's ken. Its peoples are vastly more numerous, their relations are infinitely more complex. In the mighty process of the education of the race, we are more conscious of the difficulties besetting the progress of religion among peoples in every stage of social, intellectual, and moral advance. Sharp lines are drawn between the higher and the lower culture, and we do not feel the same confidence that any single form of faith can ever embrace them all. Yet the ideals of Hebrew prophecy, set free from local limitation by Jesus, its "consummate flower," have been carried round the earth by the most progressive nations. With infinite difficulty the prayer first uttered by Jewish lips, 'Thy kingdom come,' is slowly establishing itself in the human heart. It is the symbol of the triumph of righteousness, the victory of good. In this is expressed what we believe to be the divine purpose for man. This gives a meaning to existence; whoso embraces this as its secret will never doubt whether life is worth living. It strikes a note of harmony with some of the forecasts of science; and it finds analogies with the unity of thought implied in current ideals of social evolution. In the immense conflict which envelops us, we can only play our part worthily when we see, however dimly, the goal to which it tends. The modern seer truly interprets the spirit of the past when he proclaims as the great object of the faith of the present—

> That God, which ever lives and loves,
> One God, one law, one element,
> And one far-off divine event,
> To which the whole creation moves.

Passing from the Old Testament to the New, we are faced by a different series of questions, but with the same firmness of grasp and clear insight, as readers of his earlier work on "The First Three Gospels" will expect, Mr. Carpenter gives a survey of the field, and shows the bearing of critical questions upon Christian thought and life. We must not linger over the historical sketch of the progress of Gospel criticism, or the investigation of special questions in regard both to the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel, but would only refer in passing to the extremely interesting parallels in regard to the miraculous element of the narratives, drawn from the history of Buddhism in India, and of the very remarkable modern instance of the Persian Báb.

The concluding lecture, on "The Bible and the Church," is a piece of searching criticism from which we should imagine that only the ostrich among scholarly Churchmen could escape. Instances are given of the astonishingly recent date at which impossible views, even of Old Testament questions, have been enunciated by prominent Churchmen, yet now the chief critical results of the modern study of the Law and the Prophets are generally acknowledged. But with the New Testament it is not yet so; tradition and ecclesiastical authority, and the supposed necessities of Christian faith stand in the way of the clear dictates of reason, and prevent the natural progress of truth in the unfolding of spiritual religion. Thus the dogma of the Virgin birth is set by the critical historian in its true light as legendary in the case of Jesus no less than of other personalities of the ancient world, and yet we find such a Churchman as the present Bishop of Worcester affirming that the authority of the Church is committed to the dogma "beyond recall." With unswerving logic, Mr. Carpenter shows what such an assertion must mean to the Church, and, by an analysis of the claims to authority made on behalf of Church and Bible alike, shows how each is found to rest upon the other, so that there is actually no foundation for either, and the supreme authority of truth is left to judge both of the Bible records and the Christian experience of every generation as of all other world-religions.

Ultimately, neither Bishop nor Church will be able to stand against the clear demonstration of the Truth, and such a book as this of Mr. Carpenter's makes a searching appeal which we trust that no earnest religious thinker will shrink from meeting. The lectures, as delivered throughout the country, have already rendered a great service, and now we doubt not that the written word will make its way, and be heard by a much greater audience, making for sincerity and loyalty to truth, giving back to the people in new power and beauty the real treasures of the Bible, and helping to lay sure foundations for a world-wide spiritual faith.

A NEW LIFE OF CHANNING.*

It is some two or three years since we reviewed in these columns Mr. Chadwick's bright and stimulating life of Theodore Parker. In Parker the biographer had a subject altogether after his own heart. One caught on his pages the glow of that personal enthusiasm which so many of us have felt when we have written or spoken on that glorious prophet of the living God—an enthusiasm which makes it a constant effort to preserve the austerity and balance of critical judgment. We praise Mr. Chadwick in the case of Parker because he has steadily held the balance, and is not swept along by his sympathy into unchecked eulogium and the mere outpouring of undiscriminating laudations.

In Channing, however, Mr. Chadwick has a very different theme, a man of temperament far less akin to his own, and therefore, for him, one imagines, a much more difficult subject. And our praise—and it is deserved in no stinted degree—must be that he has done full justice to the comparatively cautious and moderate reformer, and has recognised generously the heroism involved in a man of Channing's organisation in his final (though somewhat tardy), vigorous and powerful advocacy of the great cause of anti-slavery.

But Mr. Chadwick necessarily fails to touch the imagination of the reader so vividly as he touched it in the noble Parker volume. We are never deeply stirred; we read with quiet interest. If we had never heard of Channing, we should find comparatively little to draw us on in the early chapters. Our previous knowledge of the place he filled and the work he wrought has to supply the motive to read on. We want to know what Channing really was; and so we are interested in the rather anæmic young man, the fastidious thinker, the slowly developing citizen and leader and teacher. We know that the word of Channing has been as a living fire in their hearts to hundreds of thousands of human beings; and our marvel is that, by the force of a greatness hidden under a feeble body and a somewhat lethargic spirit, he should so mightily have stamped his thought and conscience on the mind of the community.

What story there is to tell, Mr. Chadwick tells excellently well. There is a painful description of the morbid and unwholesome period of reverie and self-inspection during the miserable Richmond residence, which so shattered the body as even to seem to impairthe soul as well. And when he was at home again, his latest biographer inclines to the opinion that it was only the affectionate companionship of his brother Francis that saved him from "utter wreck." It is in accord with the gloom of this period of his life, that he was slow in shaking himself free from the Calvinism of his traditions. His early preaching was largely of the guilt of sin, the depravity of human nature, the dangers of impenitence. His temper was "that of the Puritan ascetic, the Calvinistic saint." "His beatitude," says Dr. Furness, "was that of those who mourn."

A large part of the volume under notice is devoted to a profoundly interesting account of the evolution of Unitarianism in New England, and the gradual segregation of its votaries from their Calvinistic surroundings. In that movement Channing was the leader, though in the actual founding and working of the Unitarian Association he took little part. It was his utterances that gave shape and power to the rising Unitarianism, and no one who is acquainted with all that he said and wrote can attach any other than a strictly relative significance to his oft-quoted declaration, "I am little of a Unitarian." Mr. Chadwick, with great care and with fulness of knowledge, traces the gradual development of his religious thinking till it obtained its consummate bloom. It flowered at last in his "one sublime idea," the greatness of the human soul. But this one sublime idea was constantly attended by a retinue of kindred thoughts of glorious mould—the splendour of Jesus, spiritual freedom, the kinship of all minds, the universality of the moral law, the Fatherhood of God.

> Its most classical form (says Mr. Chadwick) was given to his most pervasive thought in one of the letters of his later life. There has been, he says, more unity in his preaching than in that of some other Liberal Christians, "in consequence of the stronghold which one sublime idea has taken on [his] mind. This is the greatness of the soul, its divinity, its union with God, its unity with God—not by passive dependence, but by spiritual likeness—its receptiveness of his spirit, its self-forming power, its destination to ineffable glory, its immortality. . . . To awaken men to what is within them, to help them to understand the infinite treasure of their own souls, such seems to me the object which is to be ever kept in sight. This is an entirely different thing from filling their heads with vague notions about human dignity. What we want is to awaken in them a consciouness of their own nature and of the intimate relation it establishes between them and God, and to rouse their whole energy to the work of their own redemption and perfection." (Pp. 246, 7.)

Summing up the effect of the religious teaching and preaching of Channing in its matured strength and lucidity, Mr. Chadwick writes:—

> As we go along with him, we sometimes seem to thread a labyrinth and come back over and over again to the same point, not without weariness. But the last effect is of emergence on some crowning height, from which we look abroad upon a landscape bathed in golden air, and feel upon our faces the freshening of a mighty wind which blows for ever through the universe of souls—the spirit of good whereby God lives, and we live also, now and for evermore in him and with him. (P. 258.)

In two deeply interesting and instructive chapters, "Between Two Fires" and "The Social Reformer," Mr. Chadwick proceeds to tell the story of Channing's gradual involvement in the political and social problems smouldering or burning round about him. To the present writer, the anti-slavery struggle is the mighty epic of modern history, and it is not possible for him to stand unmoved in the presence of the names of Garrison and Parker, or to measure out impartial judgment on those who failed to stand abreast of them when the trumpet sounded to battle. All the more does he honour and admire the strict reserve with which Mr. Chadwick relates the facts touching Channing's part, culminating in the utterance of winged words of moral indignation which penetrated to many and many a library at which Garrison and Parker were doomed to knock in vain. The man who is always seeing the faults of the pioneers is not usually an heroic figure; but he becomes heroic when by sheer force of conscience he is at last impelled to place himself by their sides, even though with still an occasional pained shake of the head. Mr. Chadwick admirably explains the circumstances of temperament and environment, which long held Channing back, and no less admirably exhibits the true nobility and brave self-sacrifice involved in his final stern and relentless denunciation of slavery; and we are glad to be able, led by such a man as Mr. Chadwick, to recognise the moral greatness of Channing's later course.

We cannot follow the story further. Mr. Chadwick follows it on to the pathetic death-bed scene, most tenderly related, and then on through the days of the building of the prophet's sepulchre. The fame of the great preacher largened with the years. Some of the finest pens in Europe contributed to that largening. Martineau's review of the "Memoir" in the Westminster Review of January, 1849, helped. And Renan's essay, though meant to check the rising enthusiasm, was, in reality, "one of the most significant tributes paid to Channing's historical importance, and the universality of his moral influence." (P. 434.) Laboulaye and de Rémusat added wreathes to deck the grave. In Germany, Baron Bunsen hailed the great American in terms of enthusiastic praise. In England, Robertson and Stanley loved the famous New England heresiarch. And so the years verged on till the centennial anniversary in 1880, which many of us well remember.

We think that Mr. Chadwick has very nobly discharged his task. He hardly seems indeed to draw Channing from within, as he so notably did the mind and heart of Parker. But describing from without—as was inevitable with a personality so different—he has given the world a worthy and convincing portrait, one to be gratefully set upon our shelves and often dwelt on. No one can fail to be the better and the wiser for the study of the volume.

One pretty legend it is, perhaps, the duty of the present reviewer to rob of its picturesqueness. On page 255 we read: "When our Liverpool preacher, Richard A. Armstrong, made a little book, 'Man's Knowledge of God,' and sent copies of it to Cardinal Newman and the Cardinal's ultra-heretical brother, Francis, the same post brought him answers of warm approval from them both." That both brothers did send such kind and generous acknowledgment is history. But the touch about "the same post" is unfortunately myth. Turning the two letters up, we find that the Cardinal's is dated April 25, 1886, that of Francis William May 6 of the same year.

SHORT NOTICES.

The charming little edition of Emerson's Divinity School Address, issued to commemorate his centenary, by the B. and F.U.A., has a really beautiful portrait of the author; not, indeed, as he was in 1838, when the Address was given, but in later life. An introduction, with passages from Gannett and Chadwick, sets the Address in its true light; and there is also a helpful "Outline" by Mr. Gannett prefixed. At the end is a commemorative poem, written for the 50th anniversary of the Address, from which we quote the concluding lines, addressed to Emerson:—

Through thee more bright the spangled heavens glow;
Through thee more sweet the summer roses blow;
More fair through thee the stormy winter flies,
And each new May is lovelier in our eyes.
Best gift of all, through thee the yearning soul
Holds sweeter converse with the Eternal Whole;
Knows that God is; not was, and now is dead,
Knows that God speaks wherever truth is sped;
That never justice makes us greatly dare,
Or love resign, but God Himself is there.
Blessed our eyes that we thy face have seen!
Our minds more blest that they so oft have been
With thine in heavenly places! Yea, and there,
Where conquering souls shall breathe immortal
air,
O blessed hope, that we may hail some day
Thy great soul holding its eternal way!

Those lines will perhaps send fresh readers to the Address itself, for they indicate something of what is in it. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand. 1s. net.)

MISS TAGART has compiled an interesting little volume on The Hungarian and Transylvanian Unitarians, with special reference to their connection with the Unitarians of England. First comes an account by Miss Tagart of her first visit to Transylvania, where in 1858 she went with her father, who carried the help and sympathy of English Unitarians to their co-religionists at a time of crisis in the distant East. Of the later visits of the Revs. J. J. Taylor and A. Gordon, a record is added in the words of an article reprinted from the INQUIRER, and then follows a fuller account of the Hungarian tour organised by Miss Tagart in 1901, by various members of the party. There is a section on the Hungarian students at Manchester College, and the book concludes with an "Approximate list of dates, showing the struggles for Religious Liberty." To the members of the party of 1901, the little book will be a welcome memento of their most interesting journey, and it will doubtless find many other readers. (Unitarian Christian Publishing Office, 5, Furnival-street, E.C., 1903. 1s., or in stout paper, 6d.)

Are our Earthly Memories Immortal? is the title of a thoughtful article recently contributed to the Christian Life by Mr. S. Charlesworth. This he has now reprinted, and it is issued by the B. and F.U.A., for a penny.

WE accept the assurance of the publishers that a hieroglyphic pamphlet, which we have received, with a title page where the end usually is, is a translation in Urdu, the literary language used by the Mohammedans of India, of the Rev. C. J. Street's "Rational View of the Bible," and we congratulate the B. and F.U.A., on this first step in an attempt to reach a fresh public in India.

THE DANGER OF TYRANNY.

SIR,—As Mr. Armstrong is now out of England I should prefer to leave the last word with him; but the Parthian bolt which he aimed in going imposes on me the duty of defence.

Mr. Armstrong selected from a letter of mine, which dealt with a much larger question, one particular phrase. He read into it a meaning which it was not intended to bear, and need not bear. In order to make this clear, I have substituted another phrase, but Mr. Armstrong insists upon the old one, and upon his own interpretation of it.

Here be two questions. The first, Was I right in my facts, the facts which my phrase was intended to summarise? The second, Was the phrase itself, as a piece of language, well chosen to express my meaning?

The first question is now settled, for Mr. Armstrong has conceded, as perforce he must, the whole of my facts. In some, the Unitarian Association is admittedly exercising ecclesiastical functions. The second question alone survives, and I do not much care how it is answered. I have been careful not to repeat words which seemed, mysteriously, to give offence, but I abide by them, in the sense which they really bear.

Mr. Armstrong writes: "If the Association had really been guilty of the conduct imputed to it, I for one would never have consented to hold office in it." The use of this word "guilty" seems to me extraordinary. To what, or whom, am I supposed to impute moral fault; the Association as an abstraction, or its members collectively, or whom else? I cannot find a peg on which to hang the notion. Everybody knows how the Association has been forced by the logic of events into its existing relation with the churches. It is better, perhaps, that they should be drawn together by a doctrinal association than not at all. But now we have to choose for the future. Shall they be associated upon a basis of free catholicity or upon a basis of Unitarianism? If it be true that Unitarianism is not dogma but a principle of religious freedom, what withholds Unitarians from declaring with one voice for the free and catholic basis?

Mr. Armstrong writes that he cannot perceive why I should "see looming large before [me] 'the danger of tyranny' from the Association." And yet Mr. Armstrong himself warned us a few weeks ago to expect, in a developed conference, an engine of "suppression or oppression." How can he see such a danger in the free Catholic organisation and none in the doctrinal organisation? The admirable letter of Mr. John Dendy in your last issue relieves me of the need to enlarge on this point.

May I add that I am personally an enthusiastic member of the Unitarian Association; that I have never attacked that Association, or any of its officers; and that I am now engaged, as I conceive, in defending another society, equally worthy of support, namely, the National Conference, against the attack of Mr. Armstrong?

I am touched by the personal expression with which Mr. Armstrong's last letter closes. In common with every member of both societies, I hope that his Norwegian holiday will give him great store of health and strength, and that his voice may long be heard among us.

E. W. LUMMIS.

SIR,—I SUPPOSE we shall all agree with Mr. Dendy that the Unitarian Association, "falling into other hands, may become the means to great mischief." But does the danger arise from the name? If we called it "The Free Catholic Association," would it be less threatening? I for one do not believe it. The very name "free" might easily become a limitation, and, indeed, tends to do so already. Is ours a "conference of Free Churches" or "of the Free Churches"? It has been called by both names in resolutions submitted to our meetings and sent to the press, as if one or the other were indifferent. But the definite article makes all the difference between modesty and arrogance, catholicity and sectarianism. What constitutes a "Free Church?" The question must arise sooner or later; the sooner if the Conference is entrusted with the administration of large funds. "Catholic" is a word of even more dubious meaning.

I can well imagine the Conference, at some not distant "future time, and under the control of men of a different temperament and having different ideals, lending itself to tyranny, or, to use a less objectionable phrase, to undue influence." The best and wisest men among us might feel impelled to insist upon a Christology, to which they would say all claiming the Christian name should assent. To them it would be "the truth"; and what freedom can there exist outside of truth? Others, more daring or less reverent, would appeal against the Conference to the Association, and would claim that Unitarianism was broader than any form of Christianity; or that they were most truly Christian who were least attached to a name unknown to Jesus himself.

The fact is that it is human nature which is the danger. Each of us is inevitably inclined to self-assertion; and where many agree they will incline to assert themselves with all the more confidence, encouraged one by the other. Every organisation, every name, may become the means of mischief. There is no virtue in words to express the tyrannous instincts of the individual, nor can rules, however cleverly framed, avail to keep us out of temptation. We shall interpret words according to our belief of what they ought to mean, and we shall honestly find in the rule that which we are persuaded the enactors of it must have intended. Experience has shown how difficult it is to impose a dogma upon future generations; it will prove far more difficult to maintain a principle, and a principle against which ordinary human nature rebels. We must be on our guard that the Unitarianism of our day be not "stereotyped and fastened upon our churches," and if we share Mr. Dendy's apprehension lest such a thing should befall us, we are the better protected against it. To those who come after us we must leave a protection better than any name or organisation—that of our example; and for their perpetual warning the motto which has been forged on the anvil of battered freedoms, "The price of liberty is eternal vigilance."

OUR ECCLESIASTICAL ORGANISATION: THE WORK OF THE TWO COMMITTEES.

SIR,—To anyone who, like myself, has a clear and distinct recollection of the assurances, given at the business meeting of the Liverpool Conference by the President, Professor Carpenter, Dr. Odgers, and the Rev. Joseph Wood, that the mutual counsel and co-operation of the Committee of the Conference and the Committee of the B. and F.U.A., "with a view...to some general working scheme, as between the two organisations they respectively represent, in regard to our churches as a whole," was fully secured by the resolutions passed after the reading of Mr. Wood's paper on the morning of the same day, the state of your correspondence columns, for the past seven or eight weeks, is decidedly surprising, not to say bewildering, or embarrassing.

To me, at any rate, looking at the whole question from the point of view thus indicated, it was astonishing to find that Mr. Armstrong, then both the President of the B. and F.U.A. and a prominent member of the Conference Committee, should have taken the first chance that offered itself to him to preach against the very organisation to which the Conference had thus pledged itself, and which it was thus seeking to develop in friendly sympathy with the one other organisation chiefly concerned. It was still more surprising when, at the very first subsequent council meeting of the Association of which he was President, he should aim to show, by nameless anticipation, that the chief business of the united committees, that of a satisfactory mutual arrangement as to ecclesiastical grants, would prove to be all but impossible, chiefly in consequence of the short-sightedness, the lack of imagination, and kindred afflictions of the "Unitarian layman," as Mr. Armstrong misconceived and misrepresented him. The surprise reached its climax when, at the annual meeting of the Association, the same preacher and speaker, still both a Conference Committee man and the President of the Association itself, tried, once again, and once again in vain, to show that the doctrinal association, not being doctrinal but only seeming to be so, might very well go on with its ecclesiastical work in our "Free Catholic Churches"; that "the principles of Unitarian Christianity," for which Mr. Armstrong holds the Association stands, are supreme, as compared with the distinctive doctrine signified by the historic name of the Association, but for which the Association does not stand at all excepting in an incidental, accidental, or casual way; that, therefore, again, this same doctrinal association, which is not doctrinal, could just as well serve to be spoken of as "our central association," or as "our association," in a group of Trinitarian as in a group of Unitarian churches; or, for that matter, in a group of churches that, like many in these transitional days, are neither the one nor the other! I am by no means alone in frankly declaring that this latest public attempt, even by one so highly esteemed as Mr. Armstrong, to reconcile absolutely irreconcilable propositions was supremely futile for the speaker, and painful to everybody else who duly thinks on the question. Mr. Lummis has proved, to demonstration, how entirely untenable Mr. Armstrong's ground is both in his argument against conference organisation as a whole, and in his attempt to show that the B. and F.U.A. either actually is or can honourably become the same thing as a truly Free Church organisation, such as the Triennial Conference in part already actually is, and such as it is destined fully to become unless it be incontinently throttled on the road to its full normal development. How anyone, either after or before, but especially after, Mr. Lummis' admirable letters, and the capital letter of Mr. John Dendy, can contend that, as a matter of fact, the B. and F.U.A. has not become the chief ecclesiastical power among us, in regard to our "Free Catholic Churches," and that the position is not both logically and morally bad, I cannot possibly understand, or even imagine. This discussion, like all its predccessors, has made it more and more certain to me that the farther we go in organising our Free Churches on the basis of making a doctrinal body into our "central association," the worse we shall get, the more mixed, confused, and ineffective. This discussion, again like its predecessors, has proved beyond all reasonable question that, while "Unitarian Churches" can only be organised on an openly and honestly Unitarian basis such as might very well be furnished by the B. and F.U.A., "Free Catholic Churches," like ours, can only be properly or wisely organised on a duly electoral and representatively Free Church basis, such as we have more than the germs of in our Triennial Conference.

The only real question before us, as a whole, therefore, is as to how we can best reach a wise, mutual-working arrangement, as between the Conference and the Association, in regard to our churches as a whole; and to secure that end, as the one vital matter, was the supreme object of the contingent amendment which, at the late Conference business meeting, stood in my name, and which I expressed myself as willing to withdraw only on the repeated and manifold assurance that the same essential end had been already secured. I hope this discussion will further that end; but let the two committees, the committee of the Conference and the committee of the Association, get together, as soon as they can, with a resolute determination that the real business thus entrusted to them shall be attended to. Mr. Tarrant's letter, in last week's INQUIRER, has given them, beforehand, yet another reminder of what a big job it will thus prove to be to formulate "some general working scheme, as between the two organisations they respectively represent in regard to our churches as a whole"; but it can be done if they like to do it. Let them, to start with, say, appoint a subcommittee consisting of Professor Carpenter, the Rev. W. C. Bowie, Dr. Blake

Odgers, the Rev. Joseph Wood, and one or two others, who know what the facts are all round, and who have the sense and the faculty to help in generalising them and reducing them to comprehensive principles. Then let the committees meet again to consider the sub-committee's report. Let them, if need be, as is more than likely, meet again and again, until the problem is solved by themselves. Then "let the results of their deliberations, on these vital questions, be laid before their respective constituencies, in such ways and at such times as may be mutually convenient." Only so will the work get done. The days of independent development on either side, in utter neglect or disregard of the doings of the other, are over in logic, in good sense, and in mutual honour, and the sooner they come to an end, in fact, the better will it be for all concerned. The present time is the best we have ever had, or are ever likely to have, for the purpose. We are all in a good humour with each other, without the doubtful raptures, let us hope, of a mutual admiration society. We have had seventy-eight years of the Association, and twenty-one of the Conference, to guide us. If we cannot, even now, settle this great question, some of us, who are no longer quite young, will have an additional reason for not being sorry when the time comes for us to pronounce our ecclesiastical Nunc dimittis, even though, in that case, we should pronounce it with a very distinct difference, not in our own favour, but in that of old Simeon, and with the added lament that we should have to leave our children still "waiting for the consolation of Israel," the Israel of "Free Catholic Churches," doing the great and good work which they alone can do honestly and well.

STRENGTHEN THE LOCAL ASSOCIATIONS.

SIR,—Mr. Tarrant mentions as worthy of notice the contemplated effort of two local societies in the North to raise funds of £5,000 each during the year. Perhaps it might also be worthy of notice that two district associations in the South, viz., the Southern Unitarian Association and the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches have already shown similiar enterprise by largely increasing their financial resources.

But something more is needed. The annual meeting of each district association should be made more interesting, and attractive. It ought to be something more than a mere magnified committee meeting attended by officials. Meetings for the young should be organised, and a real effort made to interest the young in the Association. I think every association should have correspondents in towns of its district where as yet there is no Unitarian Congregation. There are Unitarians there, if they could only be got at, and brought in, and there is plenty of work for them to do even before the establishment of a congregation.

Thrice in a short time I have been forced to correct errors about Unitarianism in the local press here. In hundreds of local papers similar errors are made, and left unchallenged, giving rise to that misconception of our position, which is so damaging. One local correspondent who understood that position could do useful work in this way, and his knowledge of the locality would be most valuable if a forward movement were contemplated by the Association. This is a suggestion which could be easily carried out.

CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IN the year 1775 a little girl of ten years old lived with her parents in Crown Office-row, in the Temple, London. Her name was Mary Lamb. She was not a very happy child, and was not very well understood or sympathised with by her mother, though she loved her mother dearly, and her mother loved her. But when a little brother was born, "a weakly but very pretty babe," Mary's happiness seemed complete; she was allowed to nurse and tend the baby Charles, and be a little mother to him; and she was no longer lonely. As he grew older, Charles loved Mary more and more devotedly. The two children might be seen in the Temple-gardens, spelling out the inscriptions on the sundials, and on the tombstones in the old burial-ground; and Charles wondered where all the naughty people were buried, because so many virtues were mentioned on the tombstones. When he was eight years old Charles was sent to the Blue Coat School. He is described as a handsome boy, with crisply curling black hair, clear brown complexion, a winning smile, and glittering restless eyes. The poet Coleridge was then a Blue Coat boy too, but older than Charles; he became Charles's dearest friend for the rest of his life, and like a brother to him and Mary. To Charles this was a happy time; his home was near, and he often saw Mary. He was at school till he was fourteen; and as soon as he left he had already to go to business and work like a young man, for both father and mother were failing; and Mary had not only to tend and care for both her parents and an old aunt, but to do millinery work in order to earn money. For eleven years she so earned her living.

In 1795 changes came to them; the old father grew quite childish, and had to be separately tended, and the family removed into a small lodging, and had many cares and troubles; and these, added to some of his own, were too much for Charles, and he had an attack of madness for six weeks, during which time he had to be sent to a home where mad people were cared for. But he recovered, and never had another attack. That illness of Charles's must have been a sad trial to Mary; and when he was able to come home again their elder brother John had a serious accident and came home to be nursed by Mary and Charles.

This was the last straw for poor, overworked Mary, for she had the whole care, day and night, of her mother, who had lost the use of her limbs; and Mary had been obliged to take a young girl as apprentice to the millinery work. Then a terrible thing happened. Mary began to break down in health, and one afternoon, while Charles had gone to fetch a doctor, she was seized with a sudden attack of madness, and, knife in hand, not knowing what she did, killed her mother.

Charles had to bear the whole of this terrible trouble alone, and to send his dear sister to the madhouse, where she stayed till her reason returned. Charles saw her nearly every day, and they wrote to each other besides. When she recovered, Mary knew what she had done, but she could not blame herself, because she knew that she did it when she was quite mad. She could not be taken home, even when she was well, because of the failing state of their old father, of whom Charles had the charge; so she set herself cheerfully and sweetly to stay with and help the ladies who had so kindly taken care of her when she was so ill.

Charles himself would have liked to marry a girl whom he had long loved, but he was too poor, and had many others to care for, and he gave up the hope, and wrote to Coleridge, "I am wedded, Coleridge, to the fortunes of my sister and my poor old father." After a while the old father died, and was laid to rest beside his wife and sister in the churchyard of St. Andrew's, Holborn, which used to be where the Viaduct is now.
